This island has had a wonderful history. With six thousand Knights of St. John, it at one time stood out against two hundred thousand warriors under "Solyman the Magnificent." The city had three thousand statues, and a statue to Apollo called Colossus, which has always since been considered one of the seven wonders of the world. It was twelve years in building and was seventy cubits high, and had a winding stairs to the top. It stood fifty-six years and then was prostrated by an earthquake. After lying in ruins for nine hundred years, it was purchased to be converted to other purposes, and the metal, weighing seven hundred and twenty thousand pounds, was put on nine hundred camels and carried away. We were not permitted to go ashore, but the lights all up and down the hills show where the city stands, and nine boats come out to take freight and to bring three passengers. Yet all the thousands of years of its history are eclipsed by the few hours or days that Paul stopped there. As I stood there on the deck of the Minerva, looking out upon the place where the Colossus once stood, I bethought myself of the fact that the world must have a God of some kind. It is to me an infinite pathos—this Colossus not only of Rhodes, but the colossi in many parts of the earth. This is only the world's blind reaching-up and feeling after God. Foundered human nature must have a supernatural arm to help it ashore. All the statues and images of heathendom are attempts to bring celestial forces down into human affairs. Blessed be our ears that we have heard of an ever-present God, and that through Jesus Christ he comes into our hearts and our homes, and with more than fatherly and motherly interest and affection he is with us in all our struggles and bereavements and vicissitudes. Rhodes needs something higher than the Colossus, and the day will come when the Christ, whom Paul was serving when he sailed into this harbor of Rhodes, shall take possession of that island.

As we move on up through this archipelago, I am reminded of what an important part the islands have taken in the history of the world. They are necessary to the balancing of the planet. The two hemispheres must have them. As you put down upon a scale the heavy pound weights, and then the small ounces, and no one thinks of despising the small weights, so the continents are the pounds and the islands are the ounces. A continent is only a larger island and an island only a smaller continent. Something of what part the islands have taken in the world's history you will see when I remind you that the island of Salamis produced Solon and that the island of Chios produced Homer, and the island of Samos produced Pythagoras, and the island of Coos produced Hippocrates.

But there is one island that I longed to see more than any other. I can afford to miss the princes among the islands, but I must see the king of the Archipelago. The one I longed to see is not so many miles in circumference as Cyprus or Crete or Paros or Naxos or Scio or Mitylene, but I had rather, in this sail through the Grecian Archipelago, see as quiet as this floor, when we hastened up to the deck and found that we had anchored off the island of Cyprus. In a boat, which the natives rowed standing up as is the custom, instead of sitting down as when we row, we were soon landed on the streets where Paul and Barnabas walked and preached. Yea, when at Antioch Paul and Barnabas got into a fight—as ministers sometimes did, and sometimes do, for they all have imperfections enough to anchor them to this world till their work is done, I say—when because of that bitter controversy Paul and Barnabas parted, Barnabas came back here to Cyprus which was his birthplace. Island wonderful for history! It has been the prize sometimes won by Persia, by Greece, by Egypt, by the Saracens, by the Crusaders, and last of all, not by sword but by pen, and that the pen of the keenest diplomatist of the century, Lord Beaconsfield, who under a lease which was as good as a purchase, set Cyprus among the jewels of Victoria's crown. We went out into the excavations from which Di Cesnola has enriched our American museums with antiquities and with no better weapon than our foot we stirred up the walls, having seen nothing outside, what is that city's merchandise, its literature, its schools, its printing-presses, its government, its homes, its arts, its sciences, its prosperity, or its depression, and ignorance, and pauperism, and outlawry. The altar of God in the church is the high-water mark of the world's happiness. The Christian religion triumphant, all other interests triumphant. The Christian religion low down, all other interests low down. So I thought as on the evening of that day we stepped from the filthy streets of Larnaca, Cyprus, on to the boat that took us back to the steamer Minerva which had already begun to paw the waves like a courser impatient to be gone, and then we moved on and up among the islands of this Gospel Archipelago.

Night came down on land and sea and the voyage became to me more and more suggestive and solemn. If you are pacing it alone, a ship's deck in the darkness and at sea is a weird place, and an active imagination may conjure up almost any shape he will and it shall walk the sea or confront him by the smoke-stack, or meet him under the Captain's bridge. But here I was alone on ship's that than all the others; for more of the glories of heaven landed there than on all the islands and continents since the world stood. As we come toward it I feel my pulses quicken. "I, John, was in the island that is called Patmos." It is a pile of rocks twenty-eight miles in circumference. A few cypresses and inferior olives pump a living out of the earth, and one palm tree spreads its foliage. But the barrenness and gloom and loneliness of the island made it a prison for the banished evangelist. Domitian could not stand his ministry and one day, under armed guard, that minister of the Gospel stepped from a tossing boat to these dismal rocks, and walked up to the dismal cavern which was to be his home, and the place where should pass before him all the conflicts of coming time and all the raptures of a coming eternity. Is it not remarkable that nearly all the great revelations of music and poetry and religion have been made to men in banishment—Homer and Milton banished into blindness; Beethoven banished into deafness; Dante writing his Divina Commedia during the nineteen years of banishment from his native land; Victor Hugo writing his Les Miserables exiled from home and country on the island of Guernsey and the brightest visions of the future have been given to those who by sickness or sorrow were exiled from the outer world into rooms of suffering. Only those who have been imprisoned by very hard surroundings have had great revelations made to them. So Patmos, wild, chill and bleak and terrible was the best island in all the Archipelago, the best place in all the earth for divine revelations. Before a panorama can be successfully seen, the room in which you sit must be darkened and in the presence of John was to pass such a panorama as no man ever before saw or ever will see in this world, and hence the gloom of his surroundings was a help rather than a hindrance. All the surroundings of the place affected St. John's imagery when he speaks of heaven. St. John, hungry from enforced abstinence, or having no food except that at which his appetite revolted, thinks of heaven; and as the famished man is apt to dream of bountiful tables covered with luxuries, so St. John says of the inhabitants of heaven, "They shall hunger no more." Scarcity of fresh water on Patmos and the hot tongue of St. John's thirst leads him to admire heaven as he says, "They shall thirst no more." St. John hears the waves of the sea wildly dashing against the rocks and each wave has a voice and all the waves together make a chorus and they remind him of the multitudinous anthems of heaven, and he says, "They are like the voice of many waters." One day, as he looked off upon the sea, the waters were very smooth, as it is to-day while we sail them in the Minerva, and they were like glass and the sunlight seemed to set them on fire, and there was a mingling of white light and intense flame, and as St. John looked out from his cavern home upon that brilliant sea, he thought of the splendors of heaven and describes them "As a sea of glass mingled with fire." Yes, seated in the dark cavern of Patmos, though homesick and hungry and loaded with Domitian's anathemas, St. John was the most fortunate man on earth because of the panorama that passed before the mouth of that cavern.

Turn down all the lights that we may better see it. The panorama passes, and lo! the conquering Christ, robed, girdled, armed, the flash of golden candlesticks and seven stars in his right hand, candlesticks and stars meaning light held up, and light scattered. And there passes a throne and Christ on it, and the seals broken, and the woes sounded, and a dragon slain, and seven last plagues swoop, and seven vials are poured out, and the vision vanishes. And we halt a moment to rest from the exciting spectacle. Again the panorama moves on before the cavern of Patmos, and John the exile sees a great city representing all abominations, Babylon towered, palaced, templed, fountained, foliaged, sculptured, hanging-gardened, suddenly going crash! crash! and the pipers cease to pipe, and the trumpets cease to trumpet, and the dust and the smoke and the horror fill the canvas, while from above and beneath are voices announcing "Babylon is fallen, is fallen!" And we halt again to rest from the spectacle. Again the panorama moves on before the cavern of Patmos, and John the exile beholds a city of gold, and a river more beautiful than the Rhine or the Hudson rolls through it, and fruit trees bend their burdens on either bank, and all is surrounded by walls in which the upholstery of autumnal forests, and the sunrises and sunsets of all the ages, and the glory of burning worlds seem to be commingled. And the inhabitants never breathe a sigh, or utter a groan, or discuss a difference, or frown a dislike, or weep a tear. The fashion they wear is pure white, and their foreheads are encircled by garlands, and they who were sick are well, and they who were old are young, and they who were bereft are reunited. And as the last figure of that panorama rolled out of sight, I think that John must have fallen back into his cavern, nerveless and exhausted. Too much was it for human eye to look at. Too much was it for human strength to experience.

ST. JOHN IN PATMOS.

My friends, I would not wonder if you should have a very similar vision after awhile. You will be through this world, its cares, and fatigues, and struggles, and if you have served the Lord and have done the best you could, I should not wonder if your dying bed were a Patmos. It often has been so. I was reading of a dying boy who, while the family stood round sorrowfully expecting each breath would be the last, cried, "Open the gates!

Open the gates! Happy! Happy!" Yes, ten thousand times in the history of the world has the dying bed been made a Patmos. You see the time will come when you will, O child of God, be exiled to your last sickness as much as John was exiled to Patmos. You will go into your room not to come out again for God is going to do something better and grander and happier for you than he has ever yet done! There will be such visions let down to your pillow as God gives no man if he is ever to return to this tame world. The apparent feeling of uneasiness and restlessness at the time of the Christian's departure, the physicians say, is caused by no real distress. It is an unconscious and involuntary movement, and I think in many cases it is the vision of heavenly gladness too great for mortal endurance. It is only heaven breaking in on the departing spirit. You see your work will be done and the time for your departure will be at hand, and there will be wings over you and wings under you, and songs let loose on the air, and your old father and mother gone for years will descend into the room, and your little children whom you put away for the last sleep years ago will be at your side, and their kiss will be on your foreheads, and you will see gardens in full bloom, and the swinging open of shining gates, and will hear voices long ago hushed. In many a Christian departure that you have known and I have known there was in the phraseology of the departing ones something that indicated the reappearance of those long deceased. It is no delirium, no delusion, but a supernal fact. Your glorified loved ones will hear that you are about to come and they will say in heaven, "May I go down to show that soul the way up? May I be the celestial escort? May I wait for that soul at the edge of the pillow?" And the Lord will say, "Yes. You may fly down on that mission." And I think all your glorified kindred will come down, and they will be in the room, and although those in health standing round you may hear no voice, and see no arrival from the heavenly world, you will see and hear. And the moment the fleshly bond of the soul shall break, the cry will be, "Follow me! Up this way! By this gilded cloud, apast these stars, straight for home, straight for glory, straight for God!" As on that day in the Grecian Archipelago, Patmos began to fade out of sight, I walked to the stern of the ship that I might keep my eye on the enchantment as long as I could, and the voice that sounded out of heaven to John the exile in the cavern on Patmos seemed sounding in the waters that dashed against the side of our ship, "Behold the tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people and God himself shall be with them and be their God, and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes, and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain, for the former things are passed away."

SOUVENIRS FROM OLIVET

Rev. Dr. Talmage's Mementoes to "The Christian Herald" Readers.

HERE is perhaps no spot in the wide world that is dearer to the Christian heart than Mount Olivet, under the shadow of whose ancient trees Christ wandered with his disciples, as he taught them those blessed truths that have come down to his children as a rich inheritance. When Dr. Talmage, the editor of this journal, together with Mr. Louis Klopsch, its publisher, visited the Holy Land last year, they were greatly attracted by the beauty of the olive trees on the sacred hill, which are justly regarded by travellers as the most famous of their kind to be found anywhere. These trees, some of which are very ancient, grow, in places, so thickly as to retard development and therefore are pruned at certain seasons of the year. Arrangements were made to secure a number of these limbs thus cut off, and they were placed in the hands of skilful wood workers in Jerusalem, who cut them into sections of convenient size, and then, with the assistance of other workmen from the village of Bethlehem, polished them so perfectly that the natural beauties of the rare wood, in all its rich, dark traceries and veinings, were brought out in the highest relief.

The heart of the olive is unlike that of any other tree; it is deep and dark, with a faint reddish tinge. Under the hands of the polishers, a transparency is imparted to the surface of the wood that reveals all its beauties. Cut into perfect sections nearly an inch thick and averaging twelve square inches surface measurement, and beautifully surrounded by the natural and fragrant bark of the tree, this beautiful wood constitutes an ever eloquent reminder of most tender and touching scenes during our Saviour's ministry on earth. Dr. Talmage has kindly undertaken to send to each new subscriber and all who renew, one of these unique and beautiful gifts. The large number of our subscribers who have already received their souvenirs have testified in glowing terms their appreciation, and have universally expressed unqualified approval and pleasure at the gift.

One of these enthusiastic recipients, a few days ago, forwarded the following verses to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which we deem so meritorious that we gladly give them publication:

A SERMON IN WOOD.

ONLY a beautiful block of wood,
From the branch of an olive tree;
Whose leaves kissed a spot where Jesus stood,
In the garb of humanity.

I place it upon my open palm,
And gaze on its radiant face;
Till my heart o'flows with joyous psalm,
To the praise of redeeming grace.

It tells of the Mount most sacred made,
By the pressure of holy knees,
Bending in prayer in the silent shade,
Of its friendly old olive trees.

It tells me of yonder sunlit height,
Last touched by the wounded feet,
Of Him who thence took homeward flight,
To the City with golden street.

But He is coming to stand some day,
On Olivet's sunny slope;
And I for its dawning fervently pray,
While watching and waiting in hope.

Blessings upon the reverend hand,
That brought it from over the sea;
Souvenir dear of the Holy Land!
Sweet sermon in wood to me!

Will all who subscribe before January 1st next and all who renew their subscriptions during the same time, kindly state that they wish one of these souvenirs, if so disposed?

CHRIST BETRAYED.

S. S. Lesson for Nov. 22. By Mrs. M. Baxter.
John 18 : 1-13. Golden Text, Mark 14 : 41.

JUDAS was not present when Jesus prayed his last wondrous prayer with his disciples; Judas was on other business. While the Saviour was pouring out his heart in its great petition that all he had, his glory, his love, his very being, might be shared with his disciples, counting them dearer than life itself, one of the twelve was consummating his treachery in selling his Master for thirty pieces of silver, by heading the band of men who came to take him. The holiest hour of communing with the Master, and the most sinful hour which a treacherous pretender had ever spent were

One and the Same!

Why does the Lord permit evil, and that even amongst those professing to be his own? Why does he not now send his angels and gather out of his kingdom all things that offend and them which do iniquity? Let his own Word answer, "For there must be also heresies among you, that they which are approved may be made manifest among you." (1. Cor. 11 : 19.) To a true disciple, no trial is so keen as that which touches the Master's kingdom. After Paul had enumerated all his trials of hunger, thirst, nakedness, shipwreck, robbers, and then persecution, imprisonment, stoning—he gathers them all into one category—"those things which are without." Those things touched that part of Paul which was crucified with Christ; there was an inner man which remained untouched by them. But, "besides all these things that are without, that which cometh upon me daily, the care of all the churches." These outward things were borne by Jesus who upheld him, but this care of the Churches was a holy fellowship with Christ's sufferings which he shared with Jesus with his people; "Who is weak and I am not weak? Who is offended, and I burn not?" (II. Cor. 11 : 28-30.) One who enters into the true meaning and reality of the Church as the Body of Christ is far more deeply moved by that which touches that Body than by any personal, family or business trouble. Judas had "cast out devils" in the name of Christ, in his name had done "many wonderful works." (Matt 7 : 22.) Judas was one of the twelve who had gone out and "preached that man should repent, and cast out many devils, and anointed with oil many that were sick and healed them" (Mark 6 : 12, 13), he had been a minister of life, and healing, and peace, and now he had in his possession the money for which he had sold his Master to his enemies! "He that eateth bread with me hath lifted up his heel against me." From the agony of Gethsemane the Master passed to the treachery of the betrayal, and then on to the shame and death of the Cross.

It was immediately following on his death-struggle in Gethsemane that Judas, the betrayer, approached his Lord with a band of men allotted to him by the chief priests and elders. The worldly Church has always men of money at command to stay the progress of the Cross, the teaching and practice of Jesus, which is so contrary to her spirit, for the world is not crucified to the outward church nor yet the outward church to the world. Jesus entered that garden as the Sacrifice and Ransom price for the sins of the whole world and he bore upon him the burden of those sins. Judas too, carried in with him a price—it was the price of blood, the guilty gain by which he thought to benefit himself and probably counted that the Man who had such power over the wind and waves and death itself, could easily deliver himself: and why then should not he make what profit he could out of the occasion? It was a devilish argument, and one that Satan has used more than once, to lead into awful sin those who have been connected with the work of God. Profit to himself at a loss to Jesus: this is what it means!

It was an aggravation of insult when the band of soldiers led by Judas, came "with lanterns and torches and weapons." Jesus said: "Are ye come out as against a thief with swords and staves for to take me? I sat daily with you teaching in the temple and ye laid no hand on me." (Matt. 26 : 55.) "Whom seek ye?" "Jesus of Nazareth." "I am he." His hour was come, and he knew it. There was no shrinking back from the known will of his Father. "I have set my face like a flint and I know I shall not be ashamed." He had just said to his disciples: "Sleep on now, and take your rest; it is enough: the hour is at hand: behold the Son of Man is betrayed into the hands of sinners." (Mark 14 : 41.) Sinners! Judas and his crew were included in the term, the once disciple had his part with the unbelievers! (Luke 12 : 46.)

But while Jesus, the Lamb of God, did not so much as open his mouth in resistance, some irresistible power took possession of the people. "As soon then as he had said unto them, I am he, they went backward, and fell to the ground."

The Presence of Jesus,

without a word, without a sign from him, was a power in itself before which they could not stand! No sermon ever has the same power over sinners' hearts as this same presence of Jesus, seen and felt in some of his disciples. In Francis de Sales, Bishop of Geneva, in the sainted Fletcher of Madely, it was the presence of Christ which made them remarkable; men could not fail to take knowledge of them "that they had been with Jesus."

A second time, Jesus put the same question, "Whom seek ye?" and received the same answer. He knew what was before him: He must tread "the winepress alone" and even in that moment of his arrest, he made provision for his disciples who were just about to forsake him. There was no warrant out against them. "If ye seek me, let these go their way; that the saying might be fulfilled which he spake, Of those which thou gavest me, I have lost none." The disciples, who had not understood the way of the Cross, who had persisted in looking for a temporal, earthly kingdom, with Jesus as its head, were taken aback. They had never looked for final defeat. With all the mighty power which Jesus had exercised over the winds and the waves, over earthly bread to multiply it, over water to turn it into wine, and over sickness and death itself—how could it be that he should not now, in this supreme moment, slay with one breath his opposing enemies, shine forth as in the moment of his transfiguration, and cause thousands of angels to proclaim him Lord? They could not understand it because they had not learned that lesson so unwelcome to them, the way of the Cross. They had not understood that Jesus came to save others, not himself, and to teach us to save others while we lose our own life and all which is life to us. Their hopes were blasted, they "forsook him and fled!" He knew it would come to this. They could never become true disciples till they had learned there was no real endurance nor faithfulness in them. They must become nothing in their own eyes. Thus by disciples Jesus was betrayed, forsaken, and afterwards denied. Yet, "having loved his own which were in the world, he loved them unto the end." (John 13 : 1.) He would still succeed in making them to be conformed to his image, as he was the express image of his Father, and even then he loved them with an unchanged love. It was for which Jesus was betrayed. He came on earth as the avowed enemy of self and selfishness. The appeal of the chief priests, "He saved others, let him save himself, if he be the Christ, the chosen of God," (Luke 23 : 35), found no response in his heart. "Pity thyself, Lord," was an appeal to a self which had ceased to be. (Matt. 16 : 22.) "I came down from heaven not to do mine own will but the will of him that sent me." (John 6 : 38.) Every disciple who lives for self betrays Jesus in his measure. We cannot follow Jesus on any other road than that which he has trodden—the way of self-renunciation, the way of the Cross. The common attempt of men to reconcile both worlds, and to tack on to a life of selfish worldliness a measure of religion sufficient to obtain a name for it and to be considered a respectable member of a church—this can no more pass current with God than could the attempt of Simon Magus to obtain the Holy Ghost for money! Christ is either by each one of us. Ananias and Sapphira believed, the atonement of Christ was their souls' anchor, but while it was possible for them to assume an untrue position and pretend to have given to the Lord what they really retain for themselves, they were betraying Jesus, and in those days of Holy Ghost power, death followed the sin. Every disciple in those days really and practically renounced all that he had, and ceased to be the owner of any earthly possession, because he so really threw in his cause with the Son of God, who left the throne of the universe to die for him. Such an idea as to make a convenience of the precious blood of Christ to obtain salvation, and then to live a life, the very principles of which ran exactly counter to the principles which governed him, seemed to occur only to Ananias and Sapphira.

Represented or Betrayed

But now, is it not the ordinary life of a professing Christian to fence off, so to speak, certain moments, on Sunday certain hours, of his life to be spent in religious observances; certain moneys, certain words and thoughts; and then to give his life as a whole to maintaining himself, pleasing himself, exalting himself, amusing himself and those who belong to him? What is this but the sin of Judas? What is this but selling Jesus for silver, the position, the pleasure of a lost world? "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me." There are but two ways, the way of the Cross, or the way of Judas the betrayer; the esteeming of Jesus above all else, or the selling Jesus for something else, for money, for a valueless reputation, for miserable and shortlived pleasures, in short, for self and its claims. We are saved for Jesus' sake, saved that we may follow, and be like him.

LESSON POINTS.

Especially Adapted to the Requirements of the Desk.

WHEN Jesus had spoken these words he went forth with his disciples over the brook Cedron. Christ the impersonation of true bravery who fearlessly faced his betrayal into the hands of his adversaries, the buffetings, the crown of thorns, the death on the cross, goes to the garden of Gethsemane and there for three hours agonizes in earnest, heartfelt prayer for strength to sustain him in this the time of his supreme trial. What an example for all time to the tried and tempted of all generations! The Lord help us all to learn the important lesson the Master here teaches his children and in every time of trial and perplexity seek divine help and guidance, always remembering that the greater our need the greater the occasion for ardent prayer.

At one time in the life of Luther, there was a critical moment in the affairs of the Reformation. Bitter persecution prevailed with extraordinary power and threatened every one. These were days when faith could only cling. There were but few friends to the reformers, and these had but little strength. Their enemies were strong, proud, cruel, arrogant. But Luther relied on his God and at this time with his favorite hymn in his heart, "A mighty fortress is our God," he went to the Lord in prayer, and prayed that omnipotence would come to the help of their weakness. Long he wrestled alone with God in his closet; till like Jacob of old, he prevailed. Then he went into the room, where his family had assembled, with joyous heart and shining face, and raising both hands, and lifting his eyes heavenward exclaimed, "We have overcome, we have overcome!"

This was astonishing as there was not the slightest indication that could bid them hope for relief. But immediately after that the welcome tidings came that the Emperor, Charles V., had issued a proclamation of "Religious Toleration in Germany," thus ensuring to Luther and his followers imperial protection in their efforts for religious liberty.

Surely the Lord God omnipotent reigneth, and none that trust him seek his help in vain.

Judas then, having received a band of men and officers, cometh thither. Here is an unworthy disciple of Christ betraying his master for sordid gain. Denounce him as we may there are plenty of the same kind of disciples in the church to-day. They are influenced in their church relations and their contributions to the good cause solely by their hope of gain. Some are Christians because it helps them in a financial sense, others because it gives them a standing in the community, others again because it gives them power.

There was a certain missionary out West who was trying to build a church. He tried to induce the different farmers and storekeepers to subscribe towards this new enterprise. Among those who put down their names on the subscription list was a miserly old farmer from whom the young missionary never expected a cent. A day or two afterward, the minister met the farmer.

"Good morning, my friend," he remarked as the farmer's wagon stopped at the roadside. "I am very glad to find your name down for a hundred dollars for our Church. I hardly expected such a generous gift from you."

"Wa'al," said the old farmer, "I was kinder surprised me own self, to be sure; but I said to myself, a real pooty church on that there field, will double the value of my corner lots."

Whom seek ye? They answered him, Jesus of Nazareth. Here were people seeking Jesus with as earnest a determination of finding him as anybody ever did, yet the motive that actuated them was an utterly unworthy one. And so all through the ages people have sought and served Christ from motives that apparently were pure and commendable yet in fact entirely selfish and reprehensible. But while men may be deluded, God who seeth the heart and knoweth our innermost secrets can never be deceived.

There was a certain king who wanted to build a cathedral, and that the credit of it might be all his own, he forbade any from contributing to its erection, in the least degree. A tablet was placed in the side of the building and on it his name was carved as the builder. But that night he saw in a dream an angel, who came down and erased his name, and the name of a poor widow appeared in its stead. This was three times repeated, when the enraged king summoned the woman before him and demanded:

"What have you been doing? and why have you broken my commandment?"

The trembling woman replied: "I love the Lord and long to do something for his name, and for the building up of his church. I was forbidden to touch it in any way; so in my poverty, I brought a wisp of hay for the horses that drew the stones." And the king saw that he had labored for his own glory, but the widow for the glory of God.

TREACHERY PUNISHED.

A Story of the S. S. Golden Text for Nov. 22, "The Son of Man is betrayed into the hands of sinners." Mark 14 : 41.

LATE one winter night a man stepped quickly down the stoop of a not very respectable-looking house, saying to another man who stood in the doorway and evidently lived there: "All right, Kennedy, I'll bring him."

Good-night." He turned around as he spoke facing the man in the doorway, and consequently did not see another man on the sidewalk close to him. With this man he collided as he started homeward. He apologized and was proceeding on his way when the newcomer hailed him.

"Hello! Craven, is that you? Going home? We'll walk together. You still go to old Kennedy's, I see. I should quit it if I were you. I know it is hard when you are in the way of going. I found it so in my case, but I have been very thankful I made the struggle. It is nothing but gambling, call it what you will, and it's bad in all ways. You lose more money than you gain, and you lose your energy and interest in business. Such men as you and I have no business in such places. We cannot afford it."

"You are about right, Harvey," said the man addressed as Craven, "I have been making up my mind to quit, but I can't do it just now."

"Why not? You are running a risk every time you go there. How much would your position in the bank be worth to-night if it had been old Mowbray you ran against just now, instead of me?"

"I suppose it would not be worth a cent. The old man has been very good to me; I owe everything to him, but he would have no mercy if he knew what kind of a house Kennedy keeps and that I go there. But I am not likely to run against him. He is never out so late, nor in this neighborhood."

"Well, some one else may see you and tell him. Who was that I heard you promising to bring with you just now?"

"Why I am ashamed to tell you, Harvey," Craven answered. "It's a cruel thing, and I hate to do it, but old Kennedy has me in his power. He holds some pretty heavy notes of mine for money advanced to me when I was badly hit, and he is threatening me. He won't renew unless I take young Mowbray there and introduce him. I let it out one night that the young fellow wanted to see such a place and Kennedy insists that I bring him. If I don't he will ruin me."

"Don't do it, Craven; it's worse than murder. It will break his father's heart to have his son become a gambler and that is what it will end in. You admit that the old gentleman has been your best friend; you can never be so ungrateful as to repay him by helping Kennedy to ruin his son. Why, you would be as mean as Judas—meaner than a dog to do it."

"You use hard words, Harvey. But what am I to do?"

"Don't do it at any price, Craven. It is the price of the young fellow's blood. I would face the music—I would do anything rather than yield. Besides, Kennedy is not to be trusted. You might never get what he promises you, and if you did he would still have it in his power to ruin you. Do you remember that old Norse legend of Earl Hakon and his thrall?"

"No, I have not read books as you have. What is it?"

"The story runs that the Earl was hard pressed in his struggle with King Olaf. He had fought bravely but was beaten. He knew he must hide or he would be killed; so taking one thrall (bondsmen) who owed everything to him and whose fidelity he thought was secured by a thousand acts of kindness, he applied to an old friend for shelter. She hid the two men in a subterranean room excavated under the yard where her cattle and swine were kept. There they were safe and she fed them herself. But one day, Olaf came that way and the two men could hear him speaking to his soldiers above the place where they lay. He was promising a large sum of money to anyone who would bring him Earl Hakon's head. In the dim light of their hiding-place the Earl saw a look of cupidity steal over his thrall's face. But it seemed impossible that one who owed him so much could betray him. But that night while Hakon slept the thrall fell upon him and cut off his head with the axe. He carried it to King Olaf, and told his story. Olaf was a man of rough honor, he paid the thrall the promised reward. But the treachery disgusted him although it was so useful, and having paid the money and so redeemed his word, he ordered the thrall to be beheaded, and his head was exhibited on the town wall beside that of the Earl's. That was the end of that piece of treachery, and I predict that if you do your piece, you will have as much reason to rue it as had the thrall."

"What a horrible story, Harvey; but I see your meaning. I guess I will not oblige Kennedy, but it will make him mad now that I have promised. I must think it over."

Harvey did not see Craven again for some weeks, but as he heard nothing of any exposure he feared that the tempted man had yielded to the temptation. He was not long in doubt. Among his mail one morning was a letter from Craven. Harassed by the man in whose power he was, bowed down with remorse for the treachery he had committed, he had fled the country and begged Harvey to go to the venerable father and break the news to him, in the hope that it might not yet be too late to rescue his son from utter ruin.

THE WEEK OF PRAYER.

THE following are the subjects selected by the Evangelical Alliance for the Week of Prayer which, as usual, will begin on the first Sunday of the new year—January 3, 1892:

Sunday sermons. "I will pour water upon him that is thirsty." (Isa. 44: 1-5.) "The unity of the spirit in the bond of peace." (Eph. 4: 3.)

Monday. Confession, praise and prayer for spiritual blessings.

Tuesday. The Church of Christ: for the presence of the Saviour, and the gift of the Holy Spirit to comfort, sustain, direct, quicken and inspire.

Wednesday. For Families and Young People, Sunday Schools, Day Schools and Associations of Young Men and Women, Colleges, and Training Institutions.

Thursday. For Nations and the World, Sovereigns, Rulers, Soldiers and Sailors.

Friday. Missions to the Heathen.

Saturday. Missions to the Jews and Home Evangelization.

SHABBY DIMES.

NUMEROUS complaints are being made in New York and many Southern cities about the new dimes which have recently been issued by the New Orleans Mint. A few days ago a man was arrested in St. Louis for having a number of them in his possession. A store-keeper gave him in charge, the police, like the store-keeper believing that they were counterfeiters. They are rough at the edges looking as if they were of base metal on which tin-foil had been clumsily put on. The man was discharged on the evidence of a bank-teller who said that although the coins looked like counterfeits, they were genuine, but had been made from the imperfect dies which the Government still uses at the New Orleans Mint. The public will soon get accustomed to them, but at present the rough edges cause car-conductors and others to regard them with suspicion. Sometimes genuine Christians are suspected of being hypocrites for an analogous reason. The rough edges in speech and manner arouse a suspicion that they do not possess that love for the brethren which we are taught to expect as an evidence of conversion. (1. John 2: 10.)

A SIGNIFICANT JUDGMENT.

A DECISION of serious importance to the elevated railroads in New York City has been pronounced by the Chief Justice of the Court of Appeals. The decision was given on the complaint of the owner of property abutting on the line of the Sixth Avenue Road that the company refused to pay him compensation for the depreciation of the property. The Chief Justice promptly launched an injunction against the company restraining them from operating the railroad until they had paid the complainant $20,000 for damages. The plea of the company was that no claim had been presented by the owner of the property until the company had acquired the right to their roads by ten years' occupancy. The Chief Justice dismissed the plea on the ground that the inaction of the owner did not signify acquiescence in the injury, but was due to his hope that the aggressor would abate the nuisance or compensate him voluntarily. If, he said such a plea was admitted, "a wrong-doer would be entitled to plead the aggravated character of his own conduct as a defense, and thus violate the rule of law, as well as the plainest principles of equity." The company's error is a common one among men who persistently sin against God. But God says, "These things hast thou done and I kept silence . . . but I will reprove thee." (Ps. 50: 21.)

TO IMPROVE THE ARMY.

SEVERAL practical suggestions are made by Gen. A. V. Kautz, commander of the Department of the Columbia, in his annual report to the President. He entered the army as a private forty-five years ago, and he justly considers that the experience he has gained in the various grades through which he has passed qualifies him to speak authoritatively on the needs of the army. He contends that its efficiency would be vastly increased if its standard was raised. He says: "The army should become, to a certain extent, an educational institution, and each post, as far as practicable, a military school, with the object of qualifying every enlisted man, as far as possible, to be able to instruct and prepare the citizen who volunteers to serve in time of war. For this purpose the recruits for the army should be obtained from the young, intelligent, and energetic sons of patriotic citizens, and the army should cease to be the refuge of the inefficient, indolent, and wandering element of the country." He holds that the latter class has caused the army to lose the respect of the country and the way to regain it is to get better men, educate them, and impress them with the idea that they are being trained to instruct others if an emergency should arise. The same idea might be advantageously impressed on everyone who enlists in Christ's army. In that case the emergency is not a contingency, but a certainty; for the army is always in the field, confronted by the enemy. New recruits would be more efficient if their seniors in the service were qualified and willing to give them instruction. The Apostle Paul expressly enjoined that the truth should be committed to "faithful men who shall be able to teach others also" (1. Tim. 2: 2.)

NATURALIZATION REFUSED.

BEFORE an election there are generally many applications for naturalization papers and this year has not been an exception. Usually they are granted without much inquiry, but some instances are reported in which the judges rejected the applications. In one case, a number of Hungarians, Poles, and Italians were brought into a court at Scranton, Pa., and papers were claimed for them. They proved that they had been in the country the five years required by law and expected the papers as a matter of course. The judge questioned them and found that they knew nothing about the Constitution. He therefore declined to grant the papers as the applicants could not know to what they were pledging their fealty. Another case was at Uvalde, Tex., where the applicant was a Bavarian. He, too, had fulfilled the requirements of the law. He had also studied the Constitution, but, on further questioning avowed himself a Socialist and a disciple of Herr Most. The judge, on hearing the avowal, rejected the application, giving as his reason the opinion that such a man was on principle opposed to the Constitution, and therefore would not make a good citizen. The inference from the two decisions is that a man must, before being admitted to the privilege of citizenship, understand the principles of our government and also be in harmony with them. The same requisites are necessary for admission to Christ's kingdom. The members of it must both know and obey. (Luke 11: 28.)

AN UNWITTING BRIDE.

A COMPLAINT is made by a young lady in Chicago, who came with her parents to this country from Germany about two years ago, that she has been deceived by her lover. She made his acquaintance since her arrival here. As he was of a respectable family and apparently a worthy young man, her parents gave their consent to the engagement, but as both the lovers were very young the parents stipulated that there should be no marriage for at least two years. But about two weeks ago, while the young people were out together, the young man told the girl that their betrothal was not regular unless it was recorded before the city officials and proposed that they have the matter attended to at once. He took her to some public office where they were asked a number of questions, which, being unfamiliar with the language, she did not clearly understand, but she made the answers which her lover told her to make. She supposed that the ceremony was only a betrothal, but she has since learned that it was a valid marriage. She and her parents are indignant at the deception practised upon her and steps are being taken to have the marriage annulled. A mistake of an opposite kind is often made in reference to that union with Christ of which marriage is a type. In that, people are apt to mistake the betrothal in which they promise themselves to him, in the enthusiasm of a revival, for the real vital union which can only be effected by being born again. (John 3: 3.)

DECEIVED BY A MIRAGE.

THE crew of the new American barkentine Steadfast arrived at Philadelphia a few days ago. The Steadfast had been wrecked on the island of St. Croix in the West Indies while on her voyage from Port of Spain to Philadelphia. The crew say that when the lofty peaks of St. Croix were sighted, the intervening atmosphere seemed to be of a peculiar light color, and it became impossible to detect the sky from the island, everything assuming a similar shade and color resembling the cirro-stratus clouds which hid the entire lower portion of the island. The peaks appeared to be about twenty miles away. The Steadfast was kept under easy sail and perfect control. Everything went well until a grinding sound was heard, and a sudden tremor went through the ship. The vessel crashed over the reefs, and was soon fast on the rocky shore where her wreck still remains. Many a soul has been shipwrecked in a similar way. The atmosphere of this life is very deceptive and often the voyagers while thinking they have plenty of time to change the course are horrified by discovering that the end has come and there is no remedy. (Prov. 27: 1.)

A USE FOR WASTE SAND.

IN a scientific journal an interesting description is given of a process for turning to account a material which has heretofore been regarded as worthless. It comes from the factories in which plate glass is made. It appears that the grinding of plate glass is accomplished by means of wooden plates covered with iron, between which quartz sand abundantly moistened with water is brought; by this manipulation or grinding, consisting in a constant moving to and fro of the grinding plate over the plate to be ground, the quartz sand becomes mixed with particles of iron and sand, and after losing its sharpness is cast aside as waste. This sand contains about fifteen per cent. of glass particles and two per cent. of iron, and the discovery has been made that it forms an excellent material for the manufacture of bricks. These bricks are especially desirable for use in factories of chemical products, particularly in those of sulphuric acid. The sand will now no longer be regarded as waste but will be saved and used for the purpose described. It may be hoped that the time will come when the human refuse which is now neglected and often finds its way to the penitentiaries will also be turned to account. The grace of God can turn it into stones for his temple. (Eph. 2: 19-21.)

A SOLDIER'S CRIME.

EXCEEDINGLY painful are the circumstances surrounding a case, now pending in a criminal court of Boston, Mass. Shortly after the war, a colonel commenced business in Boston in connection with an eminent firm of commission merchants. The city welcomed him for he bore an honored name, and during the war he had been repeatedly praised in dispatches as the hero of feats of personal valor, as well as for skill and discretion as a commander. It was a brilliant record of which any man might be proud. He was received by the best society and became a Past Commander in the Grand Army of the Republic. On October 17 the city was amazed to learn that he was a prisoner on a charge of forgery. He had forged a signature on a note for a hundred dollars and had negotiated it. General regret is everywhere expressed, but no one supposes that because of his bravery he will escape punishment for his crime. Having broken the law he must suffer, in spite of his high position and brilliant record. It would be well if men realized that divine justice proceeds on the same principles. Then there would be an end to the false hope that the impenitent sinner will be pardoned if he stands high in public esteem and has given liberally to religious enterprises. (1. Cor. 13: 3.)

A NOVEL WALL-PAPER.

A HOUSE-DECORATOR in Buffalo, N. Y., recently received an order to put wall-paper on the walls of every room but one in a mansion in a fashionable quarter of that city. He was curious to know why an exception was made of that room, and was informed that it was occupied by the eldest daughter of the owner of the house and she had papered it herself. Thinking he would like to see how she had done the work, he availed himself of an opportunity to enter the room. He found the walls covered with the backs of envelopes, each addressed to the young lady. For several years she had saved the envelopes in which her letters came, and when she had sufficient for the purpose, she used them as wall-paper. The letters were pasted in the order of their coming, and made quite a serial story. They were of all shades and sizes and of several tints, and one can easily trace the regular mail from her constant correspondents, while here and there is one which has some special significance. The owner of this collection would not change it for any wall-paper Buffalo could furnish or import. It would not be as interesting to a stranger as it is to the owner, because only she knows what messages those envelopes covered. It is so with the events in the life of a child of God. The world may know of those events, but their true significance and the lessons learned from them are only known to the soul to which through them God was manifesting his will (Ps. 32: 8).

REST A LITTLE.

SOME of our young people have read till they are crazed of learned blacksmiths who at the forge conquered thirty languages, and of shoemakers who, pounding sole-leather, got to be philosophers, and of milliners who, while their customers were at the glass trying on their spring hats, wrote a volume of first-rate poems. The fact is that no blacksmith ought to be troubled with more than five languages; and instead of shoemakers becoming philosophers, we would like to turn our surplus of philosophers into shoemakers; and the supply of poetry is so much greater than the demand that we wish milliners would stick to their business. Extraordinary examples of work and endurance may do as much harm as good. Because Napoleon slept only three hours a night, hundreds of students have tried the experiment; but instead of Austerlitz and Saragossa, there came of it only a sick headache and a botch of a recitation. We are told of how many books a man can read in the five spare minutes before breakfast, and the ten minutes at noon, but I wish some one could tell us how much rest a man can get in fifteen minutes after dinner, or how much health in an hour's horseback ride, or how much fun in a Saturday afternoon of cricket. He who has such an idea of the value of time that he takes none of it for rest wastes all his time.

RELIGIOUS LITERATURE.

IN the choice of religious newspapers seek those that are vivacious. Secular dullness may be excusable—religious dullness never. If a man is busy all the time on dull subjects and amid dull people you cannot blame him for getting dull; but when a man comes to write or speak in regard to the most exhilarant and exciting of all themes, the love of Christ, the glories of heaven, the imperative necessity of Christ's religion—and is dull in what he writes, or dull in what he speaks, you come to the conclusion that he has mistaken his calling. When a young man comes before church courts for examination as a candidate for the ministry, we ask him: "What is natural religion? What is revealed religion? What do you mean by the attributes of God? What do you mean by the decrees of God?" All these questions ought to be asked, no doubt, but there is one question which we ought to ask also; "Can you keep people awake when you are talking to them?" Now what is true in regard to religious address is true in regard to a religious newspaper. Let no newspaper come into your house that has stupid essays about God, or that is filled with pious twaddle or mental insipidity. One of the greatest slanders on the religion of Jesus Christ is dullness, is stupidity.

A religious newspaper ought to come into your house like a fresh breeze off a meadow, instead of like the dank air of a cellar-door that has just been opened for ventilation.

In this matter of selecting religious newspapers, choose those that will give you help for both worlds. Such a paper will teach you how to be a better man, to be a better woman, to be a better child. It will help you in merchandise, in mechanism, in your studio, in your law office, in your school teaching, in anything you are called to do. But, above all, if it is the right kind of a paper, it will open before you the gates of heaven. A religious newspaper that calls to no repentance, exhibits no Christ, kindles the soul with no exhilarant anticipation of heaven, is a dead failure. A religious paper that pretends to tell you how to live in this world, without telling you how to prepare for then ext world, will help you neither for this nor for that. O that all our religious journals might come up to a higher standard of influence. May God help us to an intelligent and saving choice in the selection of religious newspapers!

INSIPID RELIGION.

MUCH of the Christian character of the day lacks in swarthisness and power. It is gentle enough, and active enough, and well-meaning enough, but it is wanting in moral muscle. It can sweetly sing at a prayer-meeting, and smile graciously when it is the right time to smile, and makes an excellent nurse to pour out with a steady hand a few drops of peppermint for a child that feels disturbances under the waistband, but has no qualification for the robust Christian work that is demanded. One reason for this is the ineffable softness of much of what is called Christian literature. The attempt is to bring us up on tracts made up of thin exhortations and goodish maxims. A nerveless treatise on commerce or science in that style would be crumpled up by the first merchant and thrown into his waste-basket. Religious twaddle is of no more use than worldly twaddle. If a man has nothing to say, he had better keep his pen wiped and his tongue still. There needs an infusion of strong Anglo-Saxon into religious literature, and a brawnier manliness and more impatience with insipidity though it be prayerful and sanctimonious.

He who stands with irksome repetitions asking people to come to the Saviour, while he gives no strong, common-sense reason, why they should come, drives back the souls of men. If, with all the thrilling realities of eternity at hand, a man has nothing to write which can gather up and master the thoughts and feelings of men, his writing and speaking are a slander on the religion which he wishes to eulogize. Morbidity in religion might be partially cured by more outdoor exercise. There are some duties we can perform better on our feet than on our knees. If we can carry the grace of God with us down into every-day practical Christian work, we will get more spiritual strength in five minutes than by ten hours of kneeling. If Daniel had not served God, save when three times a day he worshipped toward the temple, the lions would have surely eaten him up. The school of Christ is as much out-of-doors as in-doors. Hard, rough work for God, will develop an athletic soul. Religion will not conquer either the admiration or the affections of men by effeminacy, but by strength. Because the heart is soft is no reason why the head should be soft. The spirit of genuine religion is a spirit of great power. When Christ rides in apocalyptic vision, it is not on a weak and stupid beast, but on a horse—emblem of majesty and strength: "And he went forth conquering and to conquer."

RIGHT INFLUENCES.

CHRISTIAN character has to be developed in a very unfavorable atmosphere. If the wind blow for seven days from the east, in May weather the flowers do not put forth as much bloom as they will in one day if the wind blow from the west; and much of the time the atmosphere is most unfavorable to Christian life and Christian character in many of our histories. The wind seems always to be blowing from the east.

CAN AFFORD TO WAIT.

SOMETIMES in life it is necessary to make a retort; sometimes it is necessary to resist, but there are crises when the most triumphant thing to do is to keep silence. The philosopher, confident in his newly-discovered principle, waiting for the coming of more intelligent generations, willing that men should laugh at the lightning-rod and cotton-gin and steamboat—waiting long years through the scoffing of philosophical schools, in grand and magnificent silence. Galileo, condemned by mathematicians, and monks; caricatured everywhere, yet waiting and watching with his telescope to see the coming-out of stellar reinforcements, when the stars in their courses would fight for the Copernican system; then sitting down in complete blindness and deafness to wait for the coming of the generations who would build his monument and bow at his grave. The reformer, execrated by his contemporaries, fastened in a pillory, the slow fires of public contempt burning under him—ground under the cylinders of the printing-press, yet calmly waiting for the day when purity of soul and heroism of character will get the sanction of earth, and the plaudits of heaven. Affliction, enduring without any complaint the sharpness of the pang, and the violence of the storm, and the heft of the chain, and the darkness of the night—waiting until a divine hand shall be put forth to soothe the pang, and hush the storm, and release the captive. A wife abused, persecuted and a perpetual exile from every earthly comfort—waiting, waiting, until the Lord shall gather up His dear children in a heavenly home, and no poor Vashti will ever be thrust from the palace gate.

An Arctic explorer found a ship floating helplessly about among the icebergs, and going on board he found that the captain was frozen at his logbook; and the helmsman was frozen at the wheel, and the men on the outlook were frozen in their places. That was awful, but magnificent. All the Arctic blasts and all the icebergs could not drive them from their duty. Their silence was louder than thunder. And this old ship of a world has many at their posts in the awful chill of neglect, and frozen of the world's scorn; and their silence shall be the eulogy of the skies, and be rewarded long after this weather-beaten craft of a planet shall have made its last voyage.

STRUCK ON THE HEAD.

THE coroner's jury have come in: Facts: A fight in a grog shop. Michael wants a drink. The bartender refuses to let him have it. Michael wants a drink so much he leaps over the bar to get it. Bartender takes up a bottle, and with it breaks Michael's head. The verdict of the coroner's jury so declares it. But this is not a peculiar case. The bottle is breaking more heads to-day than is any weapon. We talk not of the hearts but of the heads. Our literary and newspaper men are so pressed of hard work, and kept up so late nights, and so exhausted of nervous energy, that many of them are taking artificial stimulants to keep up. They show it in their eyes and cheeks, and some of them in the inflammation of the end of their nose. They are gradually going down. Every year they are able to do less and less. After a while they will disappear, and the doctors will apply a high-sounding Latin term to the style of their decease. But all the world will know that they were killed by the same weapon that slew Michael. Struck across the head with a bottle.

BRIEF NOTES.

Dr. T. J. Barnardo, the friend of London street waifs, has this year sent out three hundred and seventy boys and girls to Canada, making nearly five thousand in all from the commencement of his work.

Unfermented wine has been used by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon's desire at the Communion Service in the London Metropolitan Tabernacle for several years. Mr. Spurgeon signed the total abstinence pledge in 1866.

The total number of Protestant pastors, evangelists, and teachers now engaged in spreading divine truth in Italy is five hundred and fifty-three; the Protestant Churches and preaching stations number four hundred and seventy-nine.

Bishop Thoburn, writing from India, says: "In our mission over eleven hundred persons of all ages have passed over from the ranks of heathenism and taken their place among the Christians during the past twelve months, and this movement still continues."

Evangelist Arthur Crane is conducting revival services at East Rochester, N. H. The Baptist and Methodist Churches are uniting in the work. Bible readings are held every afternoon and a praise service and gospel address every evening. Mr. Crane's permanent address is Hudson, Mass.

The School Board of East Feliciana, La., has been obliged to make a rule prohibiting boys coming to school armed with revolvers. The rule was made at the request of the Superintendent of the District, who said it was a common custom for boys, even in the lower grades, to attend school thus armed.

Mr. M. Dean, who is going as a Y. M. C. A. Missionary to Africa has travelled from St. Paul, Minn., to Lockport, N. Y., a distance of over a thousand miles, on his bicycle. On his arrival in New York he will give up that mode of travel, and take the steamer for his field of labor at Freetown, Sierra Leone.

A branch of the New York Port Society was opened in Brooklyn at 339 Furman Street, on November 1. It will have a free reading-room for sailors, where there will be Bibles and Testaments in various languages besides religious periodicals. Writing materials and other conveniences are provided for the sailors.

The Lucy Webb Hayes Deaconesses' Home and Bible College for Home and Foreign missionaries in Washington, D. C., is now ready for the reception of students. The course of study is two years. It is under the control of the Women's Home Missionary Society of the M. E. Church. Mrs. H. M. Teller is President of the Board of Directors.

A delegation of Indians visited Oregon Conference to beg for a church. They came by wagon road three hundred miles to the nearest railway station, and then two hundred miles by rail to Salem, Oregon. This delegation was from the Klamath Indian Reservation in Southeastern Oregon. Five hundred miles of travel to ask for Gospel privileges!

Rev. George C. Needham has removed from Manchester-by-the-Sea to New York. His address is 132 Bible House. He is engaged in a series of Union Evangelistic meetings in Philadelphia, Pa. Mrs. Needham, who has been seriously ill, is now recovering, but will not be able to resume her lectures or literary work for some time.

Rev. E. W. Oakes, of Manchester, N. H., whose labors among young men in the Bowery, New York, were so wonderfully blessed some years ago, expects to resume Evangelistic work next year. His church at Manchester is anxious to retain his pastoral connection, but recognizes the call of God in this matter. Possibly some arrangement may yet be made for Mr. Oakes to continue pastor and devote a portion of his time to Evangelistic work.

Rev. W. T. Lambourne commenced a series of services last Sunday at Bamber Hall, Greenville, N. J. We are glad to learn that God is abundantly blessing his labors on this side of Atlantic as he did in London. Wherever he has preached here the churches have been filled and souls saved. Though a stalwart Baptist and an earnest believer in the Premillennial coming of the Lord, Mr. Lambourne seems to be as successful in Methodist and Congregational Churches as in those of his own Denomination.

RECORD OF THE WEEK.

Great Earthquake in Japan—A Proposed Royal Marriage—Walt Whitman Dying—The Irish Riots—A Week of Storms—A River Steamer Burned—General Notes.

WITH the return of Secretary Blaine to the National capital, there is new activity in the reciprocity programme. During his absence it has not stood idle, as Assistant Secretary Foster has been getting in shape the material necessary for the conclusion of treaties with the Argentine Republic, Chili, Mexico, the West Indies, Uruguay, and Venezuela. Delegates from Barbadoes and Trinidad, the two most important of the British West Indies, are expected here shortly for conference. At present the trade of these islands is less with the United States than it is with England by many millions. Mr. Blaine contemplates a reciprocal agreement that will open their markets to American products. Other countries with which we shall seek reciprocity in the near future are Mexico, Venezuela, Colombia, Peru. With the first-named, negotiations are now going on at the Mexican capital. The chief trouble will be with the Argentine Republic, whose treasury is so depleted that she would not suffer seriously if she lost our trade.

A Mississippi River Horror.

TWENTY persons lost their lives during a fire on the Mississippi River steamer, Oliver Bierne, which was burned to the waters, edge at Milliken's Bend, near Vicksburg, a few nights ago. She was loaded with cotton and carried eighty deck and twenty cabin passengers. So swift was the speed of the flames that the passengers had no time to dress, and lost everything but their night clothes. There were many narrow escapes. Capt. Thorwegian was the last to leave the burning vessel, having to slide down a guy rope from the upper deck. A number of bodies have been recovered. The loss on boat and cargo is estimated at $100,000; partly insured.

A Dying Poet.

WORN with age and many infirmities, the venerable poet, Walt Whitman, is failing so rapidly that his death is believed to be near at hand. For a considerable time past he has been unable to walk, and his daily rides around Camden, N. J., (where he lives), in a little hand-carriage have been discontinued. Since he took to bed, the paralysis of the lower part of the body is moving upward, and his doctors say it must soon reach his heart. The aged invalid, realizing the nearness of the end, has made due preparation, and has even selected his burial-place in the quiet little cemetery of Harleigh Village beside some oak and chestnut trees. He is now 73 years of age and has passed a life full of vicissitudes. Mr. Whitman's writings, although not always calculated to merit high critical approbation, have made him famous because of their striking originality and force.

A Piute Princess Dead.

ONE of the most remarkable Indian women in this country, Sarah Winnemucca, a princess of the Piute nation, died recently at the home of her tribe, on a ranch near Lovelocks, Mont. When a child, Sarah was taken to San Jose by her grandfather, who was the pilot of Gen. Fremont across the Sierra Nevada, in California discovery days. She was educated at the Sister's School Mission at San Jose, and afterwards returned to her tribe, and acted as interpreter. During the many wars of the Piutes and the peace negotiations at different times, when Gen. Crook was United States military commander, she acted the part of a peacemaker. She accompanied Gen. O. O. Howard in his expedition against the Bannocks in 1878, and afterwards came east and lectured in New England. She was the author of a volume entitled, "Life among the Piutes." She taught an Indian school among her own people, and about twenty years ago married Lieut. Bartlett, U.S.A. Her memory will long be held in reverence by the Piute Indians.

A Great Earthquake in Japan.

HIOGO, a seaport of Japan, on the island of Honshu, and about twenty-two miles distant from Osaka, one of the principal cities, was visited by an earthquake recently, causing great loss of life and damaging property over a wide area. The earthquake shock was felt as far as Osaka, and was so severe that thousands of houses were thrown to the ground, many of the occupants being crushed beneath the falling buildings, while others succeeded in escaping from their crumbling homes, only to meet death in the streets. 18,000 houses were destroyed on Honshu Island, where 2,000 persons perished; at Gifu 5,000 houses were wrecked and several thousand lives lost, all the leading public buildings were destroyed. It is impossible at present to state the loss of life, but it is believed that it will not be less than 10,000. The towns of Nagoya, Gifu and Ogaki were destroyed. A map showing the territory affected by the seismic disturbance is given above.

Heroism at Sea.

A STORY of heroism on the sea comes from San Francisco where Capt. Eggett of the Yankee clipper ship, Charles Dennis, which foundered off Cape Horn on Sept. 5th, has arrived with a portion of his crew. The Dennis left San Francisco with a cargo of coal, June 6th, and when off the coast of Uruguay, during a gale, she sprung a leak. All the resources known to nautical science were applied, but the water steadily rose in the hold and August 31st, the disabled vessel encountered a cyclone. Five of her crew were injured by the heavy seas that swept her deck, and she was in a sinking condition amid mountainous waves when the Yankee clipper, Belle of Bath, was sighted. Despite the hurricane, the Belle stood by and succeeded in rescuing the entire crew of the Dennis with her life-boat. Captain Eggett was the last to leave the sinking vessel. On the last trip of the life-boat from the Belle, the waves ran so high that she could not approach the Dennis, and the captain and his men were compelled to leap into the sea. Hardly were they picked up when the Dennis gave a lurch and disappeared, leaving not a spar to mark the spot where she went down.

Street Fighting in Ireland.

AN affray between the Parnell and McCarthy factions occurred in the streets of Cork at the close of a county convention, a few days ago. Bad blood has existed between the rival bodies for a long time, and since Parnell's death this animosity has been intensified by the efforts of Dillon, O'Brien and McCarthy to break up the Parnellite organization, no less than by the attitude they assumed toward the dead chief, whom the Parnell men idolized. Dillon and O'Brien were passing through the streets accompanied by a procession of their adherents, when they were suddenly attacked by a number of men, armed with pitchforks, pikes and clubs. Both sides fought desperately until a detachment of mounted police appeared on the scene and put the combatants to flight, striking them right and left with the flat of their sabres. A large number of persons were injured and the hospitals were crowded with patients, suffering from wounds inflicted by sticks and stones. A portrait of William O'Brien carried in the procession, was riddled by stones, and the bandsmen were put to flight and their instruments wrecked. Bombs were exploded in front of the office of the National Press, the organ of the McCarthyites, threatening the building and its inmates. Several of the Catholic clergy have added to the exasperation of the Parnellites. One of them, Father Fidelis, went so far as to declare that "the most depraved monster who ever lived was now swept off the face of the earth." Further disturbances are expected as the campaign progresses.

Moving Gen. Grant's Tomb.

GENERAL GRANT's remains have been laid in their final resting-place. Last week the tomb in Riverside Park, New York, was moved twenty-five feet to the northward, the entire mass of stone and masonry, weighing little less than one hundred tons, being lifted by heavy timbers and jack-screws and moved inch by inch by lateral pressure. Hydraulic pumps and a number of huge levers were brought into requisition to move the monument to its final foundation. The new bed of the monument is twenty-five feet deep, of solid cement and easily capable of sustaining the weight of the heavy superstructure. Blocks of granite and marble have been reared above it, but the body itself has not been disturbed. The operation of moving the tomb occupied nearly a month.

A Week of Storms.

Storms inland, and heavy gales on the coast have been experienced at different points during the week, the most destructive being a tornado, which swept over part of Ohio. The town of Conneaut was a bad sufferer from this storm; streets were blocked by falling buildings and wreckage; factories were damaged, and a large amount of valuable stock destroyed; smokestacks were blown down and many fine residences unroofed. The total loss in Conneaut is placed at $100,000. On the lake, many vessels were swept before the gale, the crews narrowly escaping with their lives. The Lake Shore Railroad buildings were wrecked; telegraph wires were prostrated and general damage done over an area of one hundred miles.—A large part of the town of Cimmaron, Oklahoma Territory, was swept by fire, hundreds of farms being denuded of crops, houses and barns consumed and stock perishing. The fire is in the timber and may burn for a week to come, and it is feared that a number of persons have perished. Cimmaron City, a small town northeast of Guthrie, the capital, is completely wiped out. Destructive wood fires are also reported from Indiana. The Swedish bark, Mora, was dashed to pieces on the rocks of Mona Island, between Hayti and Port Rico, and the captain and crew swept overboard. Nine of the crew were drowned.

A Royal Match Proposed.

ONE of the most interesting rumors in connection with the recent mission of M. de Giers, the Russian statesman to Italy, is that while at Monza, he laid before King Humbert a proposal for a marriage between the Duke of Naples, heir apparent to the Italian throne, and Princess Xenia, of Russia. This union, if carried out, would bind the interests of the two countries and give the Czar a powerful ally. It would also have the effect of weakening the triple alliance, as Italy would then be pledged to the support of Russia in a manner that would preclude the possibility of continuing present relations with Germany and Austria. In the event of a war involving Germany and France, Italy would remain neutral. There is still much speculation as to the result of M. de Giers' mission. Princess Xenia is described as beautiful and highly accomplished. A portrait of the Duke of Naples is given above.

Tennessee's Convict Labor War.

THE war on the convict labor system in the Tennessee mines took an unexpected turn a few days ago, when the free miners, having been refused relief by the legislature and the mine owners, assembled in great force, and overcoming the prison guards at Briceville and Coal Creek, liberated three hundred and twenty convicts and burned the stockade. They supplied the released convicts with citizens' clothing and ordered them to leave the State, which they did. The authorities are making efforts to recapture the convicts. It is feared that an attempt will be made to release the convicts in other parts of the State.

In some parts of Russia, the forests are full of Jewish refugees, who are dying of starvation.

The Czar has abandoned his projected trip to the Crimea, though fear of assassination by the Nihilists, it is said.

Nineteen dwelling were destroyed by an incendiary fire at Clinton, N. J., last week, involving a loss of $100,000.

North Dakota was visited by a blizzard last week doing immense damage. The wind blew at the rate of eighty miles an hour.

The Emperor William's organ, the Reichsanzeiger, has startled Berlin by a strong editorial deploring the prevalence of immorality in that city, and urging the local authorities to adopt resolute measures for its suppression.

Madagascar natives have massacred the French military escort of Dr. Heziat, the Chief of the Medical Staff of the French Colony. The massacre occurred at a point on the Bet-siboka River, where the doctor's party was ambushed.

Mr. Jesse Seligman, the well known banker of New York, is now in Berlin for the purpose of interesting foreign financiers in arriving at some international agreement in the interest of bi-metallism. Germany is said to favor the bi-metallic standard.

The Yaquis Indians are on the warpath and the Mexican government is about to send troops against them. The Cherokee Indian lands will shortly be opened to settlers. There are several million of acres, now occupied by four tribes, to be opened.

The Catholic School question has become a burning one in Manitoba. Premier Greenway has decided in behalf of the Government to appeal from the decision of the Supreme Court at Ottawa, which declares the law abolishing Catholic Schools unconstitutional.

It is rumored that France and Russia have proposed the organization of a European Peace League, as a counter-movement to the Triple Alliance. The object is to invite Serbia, Montenegro, Sweden, Denmark, Greece and other governments to join with the two leading powers in the new League.

The famous British Grenadier Guards, who were sent to Bermuda last year for insubordination, have again become rebellious—this time on account of their rations being of inferior quality. For flinging the rations out of the barrack windows at Windsor, an entire Company of the Third Battalion were arrested as mutineers.

New York is to have a Tilden Library, after all. By agreement with Mrs. Hazard, a grand-niece of the late Gov. Tilden, the executors will be allowed $2,000,000 to carry out the library project. The Court of Appeals gave the entire estate to the contestants of the will, thus voiding the library bequest, and the gift comes quite unexpectedly.

The subsidence of the floods in Spain reveals appalling evidence of loss of life and damage to property. There are still many districts under water, however, and communication between several large towns is cut off. In Tortosa the streets are like rivers. In the Province of Tarragona, the villages are completely isolated, crops lost, live stock drowned and human life rendered extremely perilous.

The Maverick National Bank of Boston, the most prominent financial institution in New England, has suspended. It had been in a shaky condition for a year past, and many heavy deposits were withdrawn. Three hundred banks, South and West, are among the depositors, and there are 1200 individual depositors. Millions of the bank funds are said to have been wasted in speculation. Nearly $2,000,000 in deposits were withdrawn in the last ten days.

In his annual report, Major Gen. Schofield makes a strong plea for the reorganization of the Army. He declares that the entire military force of the United States would be inadequate to prevent great loss of life, in the event of a general Indian outbreak, and recommends that several thousand men be added to the present enlisted strength. The experiment of enlisting Indians has thus far satisfactory, and he thinks should be

BAD LODGERS.

"O Jerusalem, wash thine heart from wickedness, that thou mayest be saved. How long shall thy vain thoughts lodge within thee?"—Jeremiah 4: 14.

ONE notices in reading such a chapter as this fourth of Jeremiah that the change which God required in the Jewish people was a very deep and thorough one. It was not only the washing of their hands, the cleansing of their outward lives, but the washing of their hearts from wickedness; and the Lord did not alone require of them that they should cease from wicked actions, but even from vain thoughts. The like demand he makes of us, for he saith by the mouth of his servant James, "Cleanse your hands, ye sinners; and purify your hearts, ye double minded." This makes our holy religion such a weighty and solemn business. If it were wholly a matter of outward ordinances, we might take the child and sprinkle it, or might bring the adult and plunge him; or we might admit all to a table where they should eat and drink such consecrated materials as should save them. This would be all easy enough, and hence men cling to a religion of ceremonies; for heart religion is troublesome, and the ungodly cannot endure it. Ritualism is

The Most Popular Religion in the world, because it is all "Hi! Presto!" Done in a minute—nothing to think of, nothing to care about, nothing to sorrow over. It is all a mere matter of form, which men leave to their priests, as they leave their deeds to be drawn up by their lawyers, and their physic to be prescribed by their doctors. The little that is wanted of them can be done without thought, and they can go on in their sins as pleasantly as ever.

Next to that in popularity is the religion of mere morality. "Yes, we know we do amiss: we will amend. Gross vices shall be lopped off as stray branches that run over a wall. We will at once purge ourselves from everything for which our fellow-men would blame us. Is not that enough?" Many hope it is, and live as if they felt sure it was. But the religion of the Word of God is not so. It is, "Rend your hearts, and not your garments;" hence ceremonies are not enough: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength;" hence outward actions are not enough.

Now to our text, "How long shall thy vain thoughts lodge within thee?" Bad lodgers. Some people have admitted bad lodgers into their chambers. I have known a good many people troubled with them; and there is no use in keeping them; they must be sent adrift. So the text says, "How long shall vain thoughts lodge within thee?"

The Identity of the Lodgers.

I. First, then, here are certain bad lodgers; and I should not wonder if some people here have found and furnished chambers in their hearts and heads for these mischievous tenants whose name is "vain thoughts." Many thoughts may be called vain because they are proud, conceited thoughts. Thus, whenever a man thinks himself good by nature, we may say of his thoughts, "Vanity of vanities: all is vanity." If you are un-renewed, and dream that you are better than others because your parents were godly, it is a vain thought. If you have never been born again by the Spirit of God, and are trusting in your infant baptism, it is a vain thought. If you have an idea that you do not need to come to Christ as a poor, helpless sinner; that you do not want the same kind of change as others; that, indeed, there is a private way to heaven for you, and you have found the silver key of it, you have made a mistake—it is a vain thought. You will have to be born again, or else if you are not born twice

You Will Die Twice.

Every thought of self-righteousness is a vain thought, every idea, moreover, of self-power—that you can do this and do that towards your own salvation, and that at any time when it pleases you you can turn and become a Christian, and so there is no need to be in a hurry, or to seek the help of the Holy Spirit—that also is a vain thought.

Now, perhaps I speak to some here who really are very nice sort of people, at least they feel they are, for they go to a place of worship where they are not often spoken to very personally; and if the minister does speak pointedly, they say, "I do not think he has any right to talk in that way; people should be charitable." It is supposed to be charitable, you know, to allow people to go down to hell without warning them. My charity leads me to try as far as I can to break up all shams, and I am sure that self-righteousness is all a sham, a deadly delusion, a destructive error. It is ruining tens of thousands of people—good, quiet, harmless, inoffensive people—people, too, that are generous in their business, and kind, and all that, and who therefore conclude that they are safe for time and eternity. They say, "Well, now, I don't know that I have done anything so very wrong; I do not see that I need repentance and faith, or that I need come as that poor thief did on the cross, and just look to Christ and say, 'Lord, remember me.'" Dear friend, I must address you in the language of the text, "How long shall thy vain thoughts lodge within thee?" for they are all vain, every one.

Another sort of vain thoughts may be ranged under the head of ### Carnal Security.

The poet says, "All men think all men mortal but themselves," and often as the saying is quoted never was a proverb more generally true. Men go out to their daily business and they say, "Many that wake this morning will never see the sun go down"; but they themselves talk of what they will do in the evening, as if they were sure of surviving. We know all of us that life is very uncertain, yet multitudes are hazarding their souls upon the uncertainty of that life, under an inward belief which they would not dare to express, that somehow or other they are sure not to die just yet. What is such security but a vain thought?

I know another set of thoughts: they are better looking, but they are equally vain, for they promise much and come to nothing: they are vain because they are fruitless. These vain thoughts are like the better order of people in Jerusalem—good people after a sort—that is to say, they really thought that as God threatened them with judgments, they would turn to him. Certainly they would. They had no intention of being hard-hearted. Far from it; they owned the power of the prophet's appeal; they felt a degree of awe in the presence of the just God as he threatened them, and of course they meant—they meant to wash their hearts, and they meant to put away all their forbidden practices; not just yet, but by-and-by. They would not wait very long: of course not. A long delay would be very dangerous, but they might safely tarry a little longer. They had an engagement which would take them into worldly company, and so they must wait till that was over; and they had formed close connections which they could not very well break, and so religion must be for a more convenient season. They were in a certain business which they could not easily get out of for a term of years; but they would—oh, they would—certainly; certainly they would attend to God and their souls. Though they did not say so in words, yet their faces appealed to the preacher pleadingly,—"Do not press us too much just now. We are honest people; we acknowledge the bill. Let it run a little longer." They mean to enjoy the love of God one of these days, and they hope to wind up their lives in a saintly manner. Well, now, my friend, has not that been the style of your thought for a great many years? Did not you think like that when you were a child—when you were yet fresh to the ways of religion, and had not yet learned so much of other ways as you have now? Do you not remember those early impressions—those tears at night, those child-like cries of Jesus, your mother's Saviour? You were on the borders of Immanuel's land, and there was only a step between you and life. You wished that the step was taken, but, still—well, there was a reason why it should not be taken just yet: and so you dared to bid the Lord wait your leisure, as if he were a beggar at your door to whom you were under no obligation. Alas for this constant delaying!

Where Will it Land You?

In some, who I hope are saved, their vain thoughts lie in a similar direction: they trust that they have believed, but they are slow to obey their Lord in publicly avowing their discipleship. They know that the gospel has two precepts—"He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved," or, in other words, "He that with his heart believeth, and with his mouth maketh confession of him, shall be saved." They resolve that they will one of these days make a confession of their faith; such is their fixed intention, but the time is not yet come, for at present they are filled with questionings as to their condition. They once felt sure that they had faith. Had they confessed it then, that certainty might have continued. They have so long kept in abeyance their obedience to their Lord that they begin now to question, and perhaps rightly, whether they have really believed. The Lord Jesus has said, "He that confesseth me before man, him will I confess before my Father which is in heaven." But, then, somebody would laugh at them: they would have

A Cross to Carry,

and this hinders them, and therefore they postpone obedience to an indefinite period. But this cowardice is not intended to last for ever: they are going to be very brave one of these days: you shall see them performing great exploits. They intend before very long openly to say, "I am on the Lord's side;" they will come forward and display their colors; they will be the bravest of the brave; only not just yet. "How long shall thy vain thoughts"—thy ineffectual promises of obedience to Christ—"lodge within thee?"

Now, I shall come closely home to some here whom I love in the Lord if I say that resolutions to be very useful, prayerful, and holy are often little better than vain thoughts, because they are encumbered with procrastination. There are many who love the Lord, who have never done much for him; their mind is made up to rise to a higher life; they will give more time to Bible-reading and prayer; they they will grow quite strong Christians; and when that happens then they are going to do some great thing—I do not know quite what form their resolution is to take; but they will do something extraordinary. They will enter the Sunday School and bring scores of little children to the Saviour's feet. They are going to serve the Lord by personal exertion, or to give to the cause of God very largely of their substance. It has been on their hearts a long time to be bountiful benefactors to the poor, to the church at home, and to missionaries abroad. They have not given much yet; but before long they intend to overflow like gushing fountains which send forth rivers of water. They are resolving: when will they come to acting? Some men brood so long over their future intentions that they all of them become addled eggs, and nothing whatever is hatched. O man, "whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it," do it, do it "with thy might." I have thus mentioned to you several groups of bad lodgers, of whom the text says, "How long shall vain thoughts lodge within thee?"

Their Faults.

II. Now, secondly, let me show what bad lodgers they are. Vain thoughts get admittance into our heads and hearts, and there they make themselves at home, and do mischief without end. They run upstairs and downstairs, and all over the house, and they multiply every day; but they are dreadful pests, the worst lodgers the soul can harbor. For, first, they are deceitful. What deceptiveness it is on the part of any man who knows to do good and does it not, that he should think to put off God with empty promises. Oh, I would turn such a lodger as that out. David said, "He that telleth lies shall not tarry in my house." Do not suffer these vain thoughts to lodge a day longer; for they disgrace you, and place you in jeopardy.

Vain thoughts are bad lodgers, for they pay no rent; they bring in nothing good to those who entertain them. What good does it do to any man to harbor in his mind the empty promise of future repentance. I would rather hear a man say straight out, "Now, look here: I never mean to repent or believe, my mind is made up as to that matter." This, at least, is truthful: that man will, perhaps, change his mind, or God will change it. But that other man—the soft putty-like being, the India-rubber man, squeeze him; pull him out: force him together again; do what you will with him; he gets back into his old shape. There is no solid stuff in him, you cannot make anything of him. These

Irresolute Men,

"unstable as water," cannot excel; they are neither good for use nor for ornament; and we have plenty of this class: are you one of them, my friend? If so, God help you to get rid of these bad lodgers of instability, self-sufficiency, and constantly promising, because they pay no rent.

The next reason for the ejection of these lodgers is this: that they are wasting your goods and destroying your property. Why, you are wasting time; you are wasting thought; you are wasting opportunity; you are wasting the Gospel under which you sit. These bad lodgers are causing you such daily loss that before long you will be utterly ruined unless you can cleanse your house of them. You cannot afford to give them shelter: send them packing at once.

Worst of all, these vain thoughts are bad lodgers because they bring you under condemnation. There have been times when to entertain persons was treason, and many individuals have been put to death for harboring traitors. Rebels condemned to die have been discovered in a man's house, and he has been condemned for affording them a hiding-place. Now, God declares that these vain thoughts of yours are

Condemned Traitors.

Are you going to harbor them any longer? If a lodger came to your house, and after a while a policeman called and said, "You rented your front room, I think?" "Yes." "What kind of a person is your lodger and what is his business?" I think after one or two visits of that kind you would say to your lodger, "I shall be obliged if you will go somewhere else," for you would not enjoy the idea of having a suspected person within your doors. Nobody does. Now, these vain thoughts, these self-righteous thoughts, these boastings in self, they are something more than suspected: they have been judged and condemned to die; and oh, let not your heart become a haunt for things that God abhors.

III. That brings me to the question What to do With Them?

The first thing is to give them notice to quit at once. Let there be no waiting. When a man is converted it is done at once. There may be a long process by which he comes up to it, and there may be a long succession of light-breakings before he gets clear about it; but there is a turning-point. There is a line, thin as a razor's edge, which divides death from life, a point of decision which separates the saved from the lost. Did you ever notice in our Lord's parable of the prodigal son, the decision of the repenting one? He said, "I will arise and go unto my father;" and he arose and came to his father, and, as I heard a quaint divine say, he did not give his master a day's notice. The narrative tells us that he had joined himself to a citizen of that country, who had sent him into the fields to feed swine. He ran off there and then, just as he was. If he had gone to see his master and had said, "Sir, I am obliged to go home and see my father," if he had stopped to purchase better linen, and a fairer suit of clothes before he went home, he would have died of hunger at the swine-trough. But, instead of that, he did the right thing: he ran for his life directly; and that is what you must do. Quit, quit, vain thoughts. Oh, that they would go at the bidding!

Suppose that these vain thoughts will not go just when you bid them begone. I will tell you what to do to get rid of them: starve them out.

Lock the Door,

and let nothing enter upon which they can feed. I would have you unconverted people say, "We confess that we have fed our vain thoughts, but now we will not go where they can get food. We will not go to ungodly amusements, nor into evil company, nor will we talk with idlers on our way home." Send into your heart what you know vain thoughts cannot be nourished upon, what will be poison to them. Give them God's Word. Read it and study it, and cry to God to have mercy upon you. Do nothing which will help these vain thoughts to live.

I will tell you a secret, and then I have done. The best way in the world that I know of is to sell the house over their heads. Let the house change owners. When you have done that, you know, it will be the new owner that will have the trouble of turning them out; and he will do it. I recommend every sinner here that wants to find salvation to give himself up to Christ. Come out, you vain thoughts. They will not come out. Notice to quit we give you: and they will not go. Give the house over to a new owner, and let him come, and he will drive them out, and he himself will come and live there, and his divine Spirit will come and fill every chamber with his own presence, and there shall be no fear that these bad lodgers shall ever come back again. God bless this simple word to many, for his name's sake, Amen.

WHEN CHRIST COMES.

BY REV. JAMES SMITH.*

WHAT is the next great event that is to disturb the present course of testimony and startle the worlds of the living and the dead? We are in the rapids of this age, and we are nearing the next crisis in God's purposes with man.

We are in the period represented by the iron and clay—feet and toes—of the great Gentile image. The stone cut out of the mountain was seen smiting the image not on the head of gold, or on the breast of silver, or on the loins of brass, but on the brittle and unstable feet and toes made of incohesive elements. The image being thus smitten on the weakest part, the great imposing structure suddenly collapsed and became "like the chaff of a summer threshing-floor." Dan. 2: 35. This event is drawing nigh; and the more pleasing and consequent event, the filling of the whole earth by the conquering Kingdom, is that for which we are eagerly longing. There is a Divine order in the future, just as there has been in the past. Every event has its "due time" in the ways of God. And before the smiting of the image, before the filling of the earth by the Kingdom of the God of Heaven, before the abolition of existing powers and principalities, and the yielding up of the Kingdom to God even the Father, there is an event, at the very door, in which we, as Christians, are immediately and personally concerned. Our hope is Christ's coming and consequent glory.

What, then, is it that believers need to fit them to share glory with Christ? "Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God," (that is, man as he is, in the body, flesh and blood) "neither doth corruption inherit incorruption," (that is, man as his body is, when death has transpired, corrupted). Believers are, as we say, dead and living; and when Christ comes he is to deal with that double condition, because, at his coming for his own, he will find many millions living and dead. He is coming for his people as a Saviour—for, "our commonwealth is in heaven, whence we look for a Saviour," and "he is to be seen a second time, apart from a sin-offering unto salvation." This is the salvation unto which we are begotten again and which is "ready to be revealed." (1 Pet. 1: 2-5.)

A Threefold Deliverance.

By grace, as we stand in Christ, we are already "meet for the inheritance of the saints in light," but we are not yet fully meet in all respects to share and enjoy glory. Sin's penalty is forever gone; sin's power has been broken in our hearts; but sin's presence is still our sorrow. Living saints have sin in them, and their bodies are subject to mortality; dead saints are done with sin, as justified ones their spirits are made perfect, but their bodies are in the grip of corruption. Hence we can now say that "they that are Christ's at his coming" shall have a threefold salvation wrought for them, fitting them for manifestation in glory. That is to say, the remaining traces of the curse will be forever abolished, namely, sin, mortality, and corruption. Corruption will be abolished by resurrection, mortality will be destroyed by transformation; and sin will disappear at Christ's bidding, when "the mortal part is swallowed up by the life."

Christ asserted that all that are in the graves are to be raised by his voice (John 5: 28, 29), but he hints at a distinction, on the ground of character, of a "resurrection of life" and a "resurrection of judgment," as Paul, later on, spoke of a "resurrection both of the just and the unjust." Thus we see how Christ's teaching prepared for all the amplifications of the Apostles. John and Paul agree in making the resurrection of the dead the resurrection of the just coming before the resurrection of the unjust. Moreover, Paul is inspired to say that the changing of living saints takes place along with the raising of dead saints; while John is inspired to inform us that "the thousand years" come in between the two raisings of the dead. Hence it is that Jesus propounded the doctrine of a "resurrection out from amongst dead men" (not a resurrection from death or of all the dead, but leaving part of the dead behind); and hence, also, John could speak of a "first resurrection."

A Double Event,

This "first resurrection" is in three stages. Christ is the "first fruits" of it, the first sheaf of the harvest, and earnest of all the rest; then "they that are Christ's at his coming; and, finally, those beheaded during the reign of the beast. It is when John sees these last-named martyrs "live," and have "part in" it, that he is led to exclaim, "this is the first resurrection."

MOSLEM FETICHISM.*

THE Negro tribes that have been won to the allegiance to the Prophet of Mecca are Moslem in little more than name. Mohammedanism has engrafted itself upon the ancient paganism of the country, and has merely modified the form of the fetichism, which is the real religion of the people. Charms and amulets are their trust still, only the charms and fetiches, instead of being stocks and stones, are Arabic texts from the Koran (which they cannot read) sewn up in strips of red leather and tied around the neck to preserve the wearer from danger. The Moslem mallams of West Africa, who go about writing the infallible charms referred to, and giving them to those who are willing to embrace Islam, are stigmatized by Schweinfurth as "incarnations of human depravity." In most cases they do not even know the meaning of the Arabic words they write. At Lagos and other large places, there are schools for teaching them to write the texts, but this done merely as a mechanical process.

Missionary Perils in Burmah.

In 1840, Messrs. Kincaid and Abbott, missionaries of the A. B. M. U., at Bassein, were compelled, by cruel persecution inflicted by the Burmese officials upon the Karen converts to remove to Arakan and from Sandoway, the nearest practical point, to render aid to the suffering converts on the other side of the western Yoma mountains. The way was difficult, long and dangerous. From four to ten days were required in crossing the mountains; tigers, elephants, leopards and formidable serpents inhabited the mountains and if they did fall a pray to these, Burmese officials were waiting at the passes of the mountains to arrest, imprison, torture or kill them. Yet such was the earnestness and determination of the Bassein Karens to learn the way of salvation, that in the twelve years which followed, many thousands ventured through these rugged passes and came to Sandoway to receive baptism and instruction. Some of them, probably a majority, returned to Bassein and established churches there, over which native pastors, ordained in most cases, in Arakan, presided, and these were often obliged to meet in secret and were subjected to fines, imprisonment and torture and some of the native preachers to death by crucifixion. Some fell victims to the wild beasts, to starvation, or to the slow tortures and death which the Burmese officials saw fit to inflict. Cholera and other deadly diseases hurried many of them into their graves.

"Pwanku," the Chinese Creator.

Pwanku (the mythological Chinese Creator), is described as having formed the world about 2852 B. C. With chisel and mallet he cut out the earth; the sun, moon and stars are all his works; his head became mountains; his breath, wind and clouds; his voice, thunder; from various parts of his body came fields and rivers and trees, and, finally, from the insects he created came man. After him came a trinity of powers, who ruled for thousands of years and to them are ascribed many of the inventions of ancient times. . . . During the reign of the emperor Ping-ti, (Peace) was born in Nazareth, that king who came to bring peace to the world. Tradition ascribes to St. Thomas the honor of first preaching the Gospel to the Chinese. Whether he was the first one or not, there is no doubt that Christian truths were taught in China at an early period of the Christian era. The first authentic account of early missionary effort is given in the tablet which was discovered in Si-ngan-fu, in 1625.

The Mystic Nusairiyeh.

The origin of the Nusairiyeh people seems lost in the obscurity of antiquity. Their religious practices sustain the theory that they are descended from some of the ancient heathen tribes of Palestine. They inhabit Northern Syria and Cilicia, and number about 300,000 souls. They are practically pagans although they claim to be followers of Mohammed. They worship Ali Ibn Abu Taulib, the prophet Mohammed and Suleyman the Persian, and consider Ali the father, Mohammed the son and Suleyman the Holy Spirit—a perfect trinity, but they pay their chief adoration to Ali. They teach that he created Mohammed, that Mohammed created Suleyman and Suleyman created five great angels who created the universe and that each angel is entrusted with the management of some part thereof. They consider that the moon is Ali's throne, and that the dark part, commonly called the "man in the moon," is Ali, with a veil thrown over his face, but that hereafter the veil will be removed and all true believers will see him as he is. They believe the sun is Mohammed and pay divine honors to it. They worship fire, the wind, the waves of the sea, and anything that manifests power; the shades of the dead, the living, even men of influence and renown among them. They believe in the transmigration of souls and hold that the Moslem sheiks enter the bodies of asses at death, the souls of Christian priests enter the bodies of swine, and the souls of Jewish rabbis the bodies of apes. A part of their religion consists in keeping their belief secret from strangers and refusing to reveal it under any circumstances, even in the face of death.

Christ and the King of Edessa.

Eastward over Syria to the Persian Gulf, the Aramaic was the common language—the vernacular of Christ and his Apostles. . . . Abgar, king of Edessa, in Mesopotamia, hearing of the fame of Jesus and that he was persecuted by the Jews, sent him a letter inviting him to Edessa to live and to heal the king of his malady. The reply of Christ was that his mission to the Jews was not complete; but after his ascension a disciple would come and teach the people of Edessa. This disciple was Thaddeus. He reached Edessa, saw the king, healed and converted, and thus planted the mother-church of the East. The king's son refused the Christian faith and persecuted the Christians. (These facts are attested by ancient documents in the British Museum.)

DOES CHILI MEAN WAR?

port of Valparaiso with any chance of success, especially under the guns of Fort Iquique or Valparaiso, and the Chilean vessels Imperiale and Iconagua each carry guns heavy enough to pierce the armor of our cruisers. Their torpedo boats, too, are superior to ours. The most formidable vessels in the Chilean fleet are the Capitan Prat, Esmeralda, Magellanes and Almirante Lynch, the three last of which are shown in the illustration on the first page of this issue. The still unfinished Prat is 6,900 tons, built of steel and her armor is 12 inches thick at the water line. She has a speed of from 12 to 17 knots an hour, and would be more than a match for any vessel in our fleet except the Miantonomoh. The latter, naval experts assert, could hold the entire Chilean fleet at bay in the harbor of Valparaiso without damage to herself, so heavy is her armor and so large the calibre of her guns. The Almirante Cochrane has a very heavy battery of rifled Armstrong guns and a speed of 12 or 13 knots; the Huascar, the smallest of the Chilean fleet, has 4 1-2 inches of steel armor, and the twin cruisers, Presidente Errazuriz and Presidente Pinto, are as good as any of their kind afloat. The Esmeralda is the best sailer and the most famous vessel in their navy, being 3,000 tons and carrying a heavy steel armament. The corvettes Abtao, Chacabuco, Magellanes, O'Higgins and Pilcomayo are all serviceable boats, though not first-class. To oppose this formidable showing our own navy has the Newark, the Chicago, the Philadelphia, the San Francisco, the Charleston, Atlanta and Boston—all fine vessels, and some nearly equal in size and armament to the Chilean ships. We have also four gunboats, the Petrel, Yorktown, Bennington and Concord, each going sixteen knots and carrying six-inch guns. The Detroit, a new cruiser, has just been launched and could be got ready in time for service. The Lancaster, Charleston and Marion, at distant points, could also be called into service in Chilean waters. It would not be necessary to recall the Alert, Monocacy, Palos and Alliance, which are now in Chinese and Japanese waters looking after American interests there. The Miantonomoh, it is believed, can be ready within a few weeks and this formidable warship will be a most effective aid in the event of actual hostilities.

How Europe regards the Chilean embroglio may be gathered from the tone of the leading foreign newspapers, which uniformly express surprise at the arrogance of the little republic and predict ultimate disaster for Chili, should she go so far as to provoke hostilities. The general opinion abroad seems to be that matters will not be pushed to extremities. An English view is that our own resolute attitude is due largely to the nearness of the Presidential election here and that jingoism is at the bottom of Mr. Blaine's demands on the Junta. Some English newspapers assert that the appointment of Mr. Egan who was formerly connected with the Irish Land League was an insult to Chili. One London newspaper declares: "War would mean the practical extinction of Chili, who could not avoid being crippled to such a degree as to forever thereafter exist only on the sufferance of the great republic of the north."

It is undeniable that the anti-American feeling is very pronounced in Chili. Senor Pedro Montt, the Chilean Minister at Washington, has received intelligence from his government that the investigation is being conducted with due diligence, but the message conveys no expression that is regarded as satisfactory. Under the circumstances, Minister Egan has been instructed to go on board any United States warship that may be available, should any overt act be committed by the Chileans. This would mean the absolute severance of all diplomatic relations with Chili. Our legation at Santiago has been placed under surveillance and a rupture might occur in that quarter at any moment. It is reported that a number of political refugees are sheltered at the legation, none of them being Americans. It would be a matter for regret if, in affording these fugitives shelter, Minister Egan has compromised this government. No details have yet been received on this point.

It is hardly conceivable that a nation of little more than two millions of people, which has just emerged from a costly war, should assume such an attitude toward a power hitherto friendly as to insult our flag as Chili has done. The most conservative sentiment in the United States, however, believes that America can best uphold its prestige by calmly awaiting the issue of events, instead of taking the initiative and precipitating a war, the result of which would inevitably be the prostration of Chili by the stronger power.

THE LIFE OF JUDAS.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Nov. 22. John 6: 70, 71; 12: 4-6; Matt. 26: 14-16.

PRECISELY what the motive of Judas was in selling his Master it is difficult to divine. It is almost inconceivable that the small sum promised him—which is supposed to have been worth only sixteen and a half dollars—could have been a temptation to so hideous a crime. There is an intimation in John 12: 4-6 that he was avaricious and dishonest, and when those vices develop and ripen in a man he is liable to commit in the gratification of them, sins meaner and baser than commonly debase human nature. Still, the temptation does not seem adequate as a motive to a deed so foul. That a man could actually have lived with Jesus, have seen his wonderful works, have listened to his transforming teaching and have observed his life of labor and self-sacrifice and yet have been willing to contribute to his death, is a marvel which the desire to make a small sum of money does not explain. It also leaves unexplained the reason for his suicide. If avarice had been the sole motive, if he had deliberately reckoned that the thirty pieces of silver would compensate him for his treachery there was no apparent reason why, after receiving payment, he should have been so overwhelmed with remorse; and especially, why he should have returned the money. That, even in the hour before his death, was an act which no man would have done whose sole object had been to get the money.

It has been thought, and with some reason, that Judas had a deeper motive. He may have dwelt on the strange and marvellous powers exhibited by Jesus. As he had seen him by a word deliver the demoniacs, had witnessed the feeding of the multitude, the resurrection of Lazarus, and the stilling of the storm on the sea of Galilee, he may have shared the opinion of his fellow-disciples that Jesus was the predicted Messiah, the very Son of the Highest. Why then did he not assert himself? Why was he leading the humble life of a mere teacher, when he should be a king? He had the right and the power as Judas knew, by personal observation. His self-abnegation may have been a mystery to the man. And dwelling upon it he may have come to the conclusion that Jesus was not only wanting in a proper ambition for himself, but was negligent of the interests of his followers. If Judas had pondered the promise that those who were with Jesus in his humiliation should share in his glory, he may have asked why was he so slow in bringing that glory to them? The disciples were suffering because of the timidity or humility of their Leader. Why should not Judas himself precipitate a crisis which would compel Jesus to assert himself and use his supernatural powers in the preservation of his life? No time so favorable as that of the feast after that triumphal entry, when all the heads of the people would be in the capital to witness the revelation and make Jesus king. We can fancy, in making his bargain with the priests, his exultation in the thought that they would find it not so easy to take Jesus as they supposed. They would discover the wonderful supernatural power there was in him, which Jesus would exert when threatened with death. He would be confirmed in the idea that his plan was succeeding when he saw the posse fall on their faces in the garden. That was what he had been expecting. Jesus at last was beginning to make his power felt as he had never done before. But when he afterward saw him yield himself, saw him carried away to judgment unresistingly, saw him insulted and humiliated without retaliation and at last condemned, then he realized that Jesus was resolved not to exercise his power in his own defence. We can understand now his cry of agony, "I have sinned in that I have betrayed innocent blood!" His scheme had failed. Evidently he had misunderstood his Lord. Then remorse took hold of him. He had thought he was wiser than his Master, knew more of the world and how to attain its honors. Now he learned that he had done irreparable mischief. He could not bear to live; and, having cast from him the pitiful price of his crime, he departed and hanged himself.

So understood, the conduct of Judas, a worldly ambitious man, is consistent throughout. It teaches us never to do evil that good may come. Never to imagine that our own ideas of the divine government are better than God's. Never to blame him even by a thought when he does not interfere for our own defence, or for the vindication of good men under a cloud, as we felt sure he would. And, above all, to distrust ourselves, knowing little of the depth of depravity in our own nature, watching vigilantly against the evil and when we see others falling into sin not joining in the chorus of condemnation, but, conscious of the possibility of our own falling, asking like the disciples, "Lord, is it I?"

A MICHIGAN SOCIETY.

We are glad to learn from a correspondent that a Christian Endeavor Society has just been formed in connection with the Second Reformed Church at Muskegon, Mich. It has opened with about fifteen members, but as they are all earnest, zealous workers, their numbers will soon grow as they do in other churches. The officers of the Society are: President, Mr. Joseph Banninga; Vice-President, Mr. N. C. Van Der Linde; Secretary, Mr. Henry Stoketu; Corresponding Secretary, Miss Alice Brandt; Treasurer, Miss Jennie Banninga. It is gratifying to learn from our correspondent's letter that much help in the Christian Endeavor work is gained from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

THE ILLINOIS ASSOCIATIONS.

A CHEERING report of Young Men's Christian Association work in Illinois has been issued by the State Executive Committee. Delegations of Illinois and Knox College students have visited forty-five different towns, holding evangelistic meetings for young men, and more than fifty young men have professed conversion. Twenty-four conferences have been held by local associations. The committee's report says: "There never before has been a summer when there was constantly reported so large a religious interest among young men as this season from the local associations, the 'college boys,' and the local conference work. Contributors and friends will also be glad that no previous summer has seen such generous responses along the financial lines. At a time of the year when the streams of subscriptions usually dry up, they have this season been constant and encouragingly large."

THE NEW JERSEY CONVENTION.

The following is an extract from the report of the New Jersey State Committee of Christian Endeavor Societies, read at the recent Convention at Newark by the Secretary and Treasurer, Mr. Halsey Hammond. The number of members of the society in the State are classified as follows: Active members, 18,612; associate, 5,802; total, 24,414. Number of societies: senior, 432, junior, 40. The societies are divided by denominations as follows: Presbyterian, 104 senior, 15 junior; Baptist, 93 senior, 8 junior; Reformed, 77 senior, 10 junior; Methodist Episcopal, 35 senior, 2 junior; Congregational, 19 senior, 5 junior; Methodist Protestant, 13 senior; Lutheran, 3 senior; Christian, 5 senior; Seventh Day Baptist, 2 senior; African Methodist Episcopal, 2 senior; Reformed Episcopal, 1 senior; missions and unions, 18 senior."

The following officers were elected by the convention: President, the Rev. G. S. Sykes, of Beverly; vice-presidents, J. L. Scudder, of Jersey City; the Rev. Dr. J. Clement French, of Newark; the Rev. Frank Everett, of Trenton; secretary and treasurer, Miss Caroline H. Brookford, of Belvidere; executive committee, Willard S. Hamilton, of Newark; Miss Alice B. Sponenberg, of Netherwood; Dr. Caldwell Morrison, of Orange; Edward L. Fara, of Camden; George Jones, of Bridgeton.

THE LATE DR. TIFFANY.

The Famous Methodist Episcopal Pastor is Summoned to His Eternal Rest.

PROFOUND sorrow has been occasioned in many cities, and in many homes in far distant States, by the news telegraphed from Minneapolis, Minn., that Dr. O. H. Tiffany is dead. He had ministered in so many large cities, had been prominent in so many public enterprises that those who mourn his death are a vast multitude. Dr. Tiffany had been unwell for more than six months, but not so seriously as to cause alarm. It was hoped that an extended trip in the far West, which his physician had recommended, would have fully re-established his strength. He was away about a month, but when he returned he was not so well as when he started. However, he resumed preaching, and on October 4th, he went to Red Wing, Minn., where the Conference was in session and where he had undertaken to preach. He had pronounced but a few sentences of his sermon when he fell down in the pulpit in a faint. He was carried out and, as soon as he was sufficiently recovered to bear the journey, he returned to his home in Minneapolis. In spite of the best medical care and the loving attentions of his daughter, he grew worse, was unable to take nourishment and became feeble and emaciated. On Friday night Oct. 23, he became unconscious, and never spoke afterwards. The next day, about three in the afternoon, he passed away.

Otis Henry Tiffany, was born in Baltimore, sixty-six years ago. He was descended from an English Puritan family which settled in Attleborough, Mass., about 1640. His father, Comfort Tiffany, removed from Massachusetts to Maryland and commenced business, which in time became very prosperous, and from which he retired with a considerable fortune. Otis received the rudiments of education in Baltimore, and afterward studied at Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pa., from which he graduated in 1844, taking honors in Mathematics and civil engineering. It had been his intention to make civil engineering his profession, but God had other work for him to do, and the indications of his call to the ministry were so clear after leaving college, that he placed himself under the care of the famous Dr. McClintock of the Methodist Episcopal Church for a course of theological study. He was ordained deacon in 1848 and an elder in 1850. In the meantime he accepted an invitation to become professor, first of Greek and afterwards of Mathematics, in Dickinson college.

Exclusively pastoral work, however, was the sphere to which Dr. Tiffany felt himself called, and in 1860 he resigned his professorship and became pastor of the First Methodist Episcopal Church of Chicago. Since that time he has occupied in succession some of the most influential pulpits in the Methodist Episcopal Church. Grace Church, Chicago, St. James Church, New Brunswick, N. J., St. Paul's Church, Newark, N. J., the Metropolitan Church, Washington, D. C., Trinity Church, Chicago, St. Paul's Church, New York, Arch Street Church, Philadelphia, Madison Avenue Church, New York, St. James Church, New York, and finally Hennepin Avenue Church, Minneapolis, were some of his most important appointments. Everywhere his ministry was greatly blessed, the congregations were built up, aggressive work was organized and prosecuted, and when the time came under the law of the church for him to leave, his departure was deeply regretted by the people.

HIS OWN.

(For The Christian Herald.)

SO many little ones to teach
The better way;
So many little feet to guide
Upward, each day:
So many little hearts to help
Keep pure from sin;
So many little, precious souls,
For Christ, to win.

Oh! teacher, weary not; your task
Angels might do,
And falter not, nor faint; your strength
God will renew.
Watch o'er the little flock, and guard
With loving care,
"For these are mine," God saith, "yea, these My jewels are." —A. C.

UNCLE JOHN'S TALKS.

He Tells Why the Camel is one of the Most Useful Quadrupeds in the World.

THE children had been debating among themselves the question which was the most generally useful among the animals in man's service, and, very naturally, there had been a wide diversity of opinions. Tom held that the horse furnished the best example of valuable service to man, while Ted supported the claims of the dog to recognition. Of course, the girls would not hear that any animal, tame or wild, should be named as the equal of the cat—their domestic pet.

In this state of conflicting opinion, Uncle John was appealed to as arbiter.

"You are all doubtless right in what you claim for your respective proteges," he said. "But I think there are others of God's creatures worthy of being included in the contest for favor. The mule is a most admirable servant and the elephant, also; yet for all-round usefulness, I should place the camel in the very first rank. There are a hundred services he performs for his master that could probably be done by no other animal."

"I remember riding a journey of some two hundred miles in Syria, on an Arabian camel—a Deloul, or swift-footed animal. Usuf, my servant who rode another, had charge of both beasts and they were handsome and intelligent animals, being of a valuable breed. The Arabian saddle camel may be called the thoroughbred of his species. He is clean-limbed and intelligent, and goes like the wind, often traveling as much as two hundred miles in twenty-four hours. The Bactrian, or two-humped camel and the Toorkee breed, which has but one hump, cannot compare with him in swiftness."

"During my stay in the East, I learned many of the peculiarities and excellences of the camel. Usuf, among others, spoke enthusiastically of his animals. 'The camel,' said he, 'is eyes, nose and ears for his master when travelling. His milk supplies sustenance; he is not troubled with hunger or thirst, having four stomachs and a reserve supply in his hump, on which he can live while on a tedious journey through the desert.'"

"Live on his hump!" exclaimed the children. "Quite so," replied Uncle. "The hump on his back is composed of muscular fibre and cellular substance adapted for the accumulation of fat, and when he is in good condition it is large and well filled out; but when he goes long without food, it shrinks because it is supplying the want of other sustenance. This gives him an extra supply of food without eating. And when he does need to be fed, he is the most abstemious of beasts. A pound of dates, or beans, or barley will appease his craving for a long period. He will draw a plough or cross a desert with equal readiness. His hair supplies material for cloth, pencils and brushes. His flesh is eaten and is esteemed a delicacy. He can carry seven or eight hundred pounds of baggage—twice as much as a horse or a mule. He is patient and a stranger to fear, although he will resent ill-usage. He is never refractory when rightly treated. Now what other animal possesses so many useful qualities? Swifter in the main than the horse, a natural guide—for he never loses the path in storm or darkness—temperate, obedient, strong, with a scent twice as keen as the best trained hound, and sight as far reaching as an eagle's, enabling him to discern water and shelter afar off, and thus frequently to save life—he is surely the king of four-footed servants. He is certainly so regarded in the East."

"But great men prefer horses," remarked Tom.

"Omar the Conqueror rode into Jerusalem on an Arabian camel," answered Uncle John. "Mohammed entered Damascus on one. The wise men who came to Bethlehem also rode on camels. Pharaoh gave camels to Abraham as we are told in the twelfth chapter of Genesis. The Queen of Sheba came to Solomon with a caravan of these animals. All through Oriental history the camel occupies an honorable place, in war and peace, and to-day in a large part of the East, it is the most highly thought of among man's dumb servants. So you ought to remember the camel when you come to decide finally as to the comparative usefulness of the four-footed animals."

A Young Wife's Prayer.

"I ONCE knew in the West," writes a lady to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, "a happy couple, who had a pleasant home, though there was nothing to make it so except Christian grace. The house was a mere hovel with but few necessities of life indoor or out; but there was no corroding care, for God was there. At one time the husband had a broken leg which had been mis-set and caused such suffering that he feared he could not live until a doctor came. He prayed for relief; instantly it came, he suffering no more pain until the limb was re-set. Oh, what an encouragement that was! I thought then and there, could I be so honored for one short time, I would pray without ceasing and in everything give thanks the rest of my life."

"My own peculiar Christian experience I give hoping to receive enlightenment, and possibly encouragement, through the columns of your delightful journal. When young I married into an irreligious family, and was not long in finding out that my husband's home training was very uncongenial. The start was a 'parting of the ways.' Years rolled on and one day I resolved to carry my trouble to the throne of grace. Shutting myself in a darkened room I there devoutly pleaded with God for the conversion of my husband. I had a season of prayer three days in succession, when, on the morning of the fourth day, my husband said, in a sarcastic tone:

"I have just awakened from a dream in which you were praying for me."
"Imagine my surprise, and oh! that tone on a sensitive young heart! Fear was stronger than love, and in a flash my heart responded: 'I leave you alone with your God.'"

"I had no doubt, nor other thought, than that through prayer, God had caused the dream, and if God was really so very present, he was all-sufficient. For nearly twenty years my heart's retort on that eventful morning was carried out.
"Meanwhile my husband's religious views became modified, and, as the mile-stones gathered, he became Christian-like, so that I often felt that he opened his heart to God in prayer. My lips were then unsealed, and now I am resting in the belief that the ways that were so parted will meet at the gate 'over the willow,' if not before. On looking back upon that particular season of prayer, and of the dream, I believe it to be no interposition of God, but of soul-speaking. Of the doubts and fears I will not speak, or the times in which my soul seemed hushed to silence through discouragement. However, through all gleams the star of Faith, which grows brighter as I near the shore, and, as a child ceases not to importune an earthly parent for its heart's desire, just so I plead and commune with my shepherd Lord."

PATIENCE.

Thoughtful Children.

SOMEbody has written a beautiful poem on "The Little Cavalier":

He walks beside his mother,
And looks up in her face;
He wears a glow of boyish pride,

USUF AND HIS ARABIAN CAMEL.
(See "Uncle John's Talks.")

With such a royal grace,
He proudly waits upon her,
Would shield her without fear,
The boy who loves his mother well—
Her little cavalier.

No boy can be his mother's cavalier unless he is a thoughtful boy. A thoughtless boy doesn't remember to wait upon his mother—his mother waits upon him. Some boys whom we have seen love their mothers very dearly, and they will go off to play and leave the coal scuttle empty or the wood-box unfilled, or something else to be done, when they know there is nobody but mother to do it for her. There is no home, no matter how much hired help there is in it, but that there are a great many things the children can do for the comfort of the loved ones there. Anything done for love's sake, and by loving hands, is so much better appreciated and enjoyed than anything done by hired hands.

HAPPY WOMEN.

A HAPPY woman! A woman whose temper is buoyant, sprightly and cheerful—whose bosom is a perennial fountain of love and joy, and on whose cheek the smile of content and gladness plays continuously, bright and cheering as the solar ray, such a woman is a treasure beyond all price. Happy, thrice happy, is the man who possesses such a treasure. Her presence operates like a cordial, inspiring joy and vigor; it throws a brightness over the darkest scenes of life, and, amidst its disturbances and disquietudes, sheds repose upon a troubled spirit.

Men make a fearful mistake when they marry for beauty, or money, or talent, or style; the sweetest, most valuable wives, are those who possess the magic art of being constantly cheerful and happy, and in whose bosom, whether rich or poor, high or low, the bright sparkling fountain of joy bubbles up musically in their hearts. Do they live in a straw-thatched cottage, the firelight that flashes in its humble grate becomes brighter than gilded chandeliers in an Aladdin palace. Do they eat brown bread, and drink cold water from the spring, it affords them more solid satisfaction than the millionaire's costly dishes and iced champagne. Nothing ever goes wrong with them; no trouble is too serious to prevent them from making the best of it. Was ever the stream of calamity so dark and deep that the sunlight of a happy face falling across its turbid tide would not call up an answering gleam?

A smile is always a lovely sight. "A merry heart," says Scripture, "doeth good like a medicine." Oh, our joyous tempered people know not half the good they effect; but the woman whose expressions of look, voice, and gesture, are all expressions of joy and gladness brings back a portion of the bliss of Eden, and becomes a minister of mercy, in whose bosom misery loses nearly all its anguish. No matter how crabbed you feel, Mr. Grumbler; no matter if your brain be packed full of meditations on the afflictions and trials of life, and your stomach with pills and tonics, only set yourself down by the side of one of those smiling, cheery women—listen to her sprightly conversation, yield yourself up to the influence of her spirit, and we are not afraid to predict that she will soon effect a cure.

Oh! these happy women! how often their tender shoulders bear the weight of burdens that would cause strong men to bow themselves. How often their delicate hands guide the ponderous machinery of life with an almost invisible touch! How we look forward through the weary toilsome day to their fireside smiles. How often then their cheerful eyes see joy and beauty, where we behold only clouds charged with thunder. No one knows—no one ever will know—until the day of judgment, how much we owe to these helpful, cheerful, uncomplaining women.

SUMMARY OF THE PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Aleph, a young Chaldean student, of a notable family arrives in Alexandria with his friend and companion, Cimon, a Greek, who has visited the city many years previously. During the journey down the Nile, the latter points out the various places of interest to Aleph. Egypt is under Roman rule, and the period is early in the first century of the Christian era. On landing, the friends encounter an aged Egyptian, Seti, to whom a drunken Roman officer is about to offer violence, when Aleph disarms the latter, very skillfully. Seti is grateful to the youth and on leaving him warns him that he has made an enemy of the dissipated son of Flaccus the Roman Governor of the city. He also cautions him against Flaccus and also against Malus, a crafty Jewish trader of great influence. The two friends pass some time in viewing the sights of the city, after which Aleph, who is there on highly important business matters, seeks the great banker Alexander. Before visiting him, however, he learns some interesting facts regarding the man he is to see. Alexander is the Alabarch, or representative head of the orthodox Hebrews of Alexandria, a man of great wealth and influence, to whom the magnates of all nationalities, and even the government officials themselves, frequently resort for financial aid. His place of business is a vast, imposing building of great strength, and here at times come students, travelers with letters of credit, merchants and others. On arriving there, Aleph while he waits, amuses himself in studying the faces of those who, like himself have come for the purpose of doing business with the banker. While he talks with Alexander, in the latter's office, Rachel, the banker's beautiful daughter, enters and informs her father of the serious illness of her aged nurse, whom she is about to visit. Aleph on concluding his business, accepts Alexander's invitation to come to the Diapleuston Synagogue on the following day.

CHAPTER III. Continued.

DURING this conversation, Seti maintained an unbroken silence—his arms folded, his face impassive as an eagle's. He seemed to be hearing as well as seeing with those ancient eyes of his that never once left the face of Aleph.

They both rose at the same time—Seti saying that he would walk along with the young man and point out the Diapleuston in passing.

The Alabarch courteously escorted them through the now vacant room to the door; saying to Aleph, as he parted, "Remember at the third hour to-morrow. Come half an hour earlier."

Turning into the street of Canopus, and going westward under the colonnade, they soon came to a corner on which stood an imposing structure of white marble. As Aleph glanced down the side street he saw that the length of the structure was immense; as he passed to the front he saw that its breadth was nearly as great. A central part raised on a lofty pedestal, surmounted by a gilded dome, and supported in front and on either hand by immense monolith columns, was surrounded on all sides at a little distance by low marble cloisters—save where a broad flight of steps led up from the street to the great doors. From the wide platform at the top the great columns rose in elaborately wrought clusters, each supporting an ornate capital, architrave, frieze, and cornice; while, behind the front was alive a with spirited sculpture in relief of the Feast of Tabernacles.

I must not forget to add that at one angle the low cloisters swelled into a graceful and lofty tower that ended in a parapet.

"From behind that parapet," said Seti, pointing, "are sounded the seventy silver trumpets that summon the Jews to their worship; for here is the Diapleuston to which you have been invited."

They passed on to another crossing.

"Let us turn down this street," said the Egyptian. "It is less crowded than the thoroughfare, and equally direct for both of us, as I learn that you are staying for the present near where we landed yesterday. Besides, I wish to stop for a few moments with the sick woman. I am afraid of these Alexandrian leeches. Once in every five or ten years they get a new fashion of treating diseases and call it science."

They turned south and soon came to a humble house, where Seti knocked. The door was opened by a shiftless-looking Greek who, on request, pointed to a door within which the sick woman could be found. On entering, they found her on a rude bed, supported almost in a sitting posture by the daughter of Alexander, who sat behind her. She was a woman of middle age, very emaciated, eyes closed, lips parted, chest laboriously heaving, apparently unconscious.

"Oh, grandfather, I feared you would not come," exclaimed Rachel (who was bending over the invalid), in a subdued voice, "feared you would be too late,—I am afraid you are too late. The leech says that nothing more can be done"—and the tears dropped fast from the lovely eyes.

The rich dress worn at home had been exchanged for one exceedingly plain and suited to her present sad and humble surroundings. But the change did not detract from her superb loveliness. On the contrary, the exquisite graces of feature and figure became all the more apparent in the absence of the distractions of extrinsic ornament; and a new light born of a heavenly pity and self-forgetfulness was shining in her face.

Without replying to her words, Seti advanced to a casement and door, and threw them widely open on a small court.

"But the leech, grandfather, said that the fresh air must be excluded."

"Did he bring this?" said the Egyptian, taking up from the bed a partly unrolled manuscript. He read aloud: "The Psalms of David translated by the Seventy."

"That is mine," said Rachel. "I brought it with me, and have read from it to Miriam while she could listen. It was her only comfort, besides prayer."

"What have you learned about her case?"

"You know that she left us two years ago to marry a man whom we could not approve: and until yesterday we did not know what had become of her. Then I had a message from her husband, who is a Greek, that she was sick at this place. I went to her at once and found her very weak and low with this fever; and gathered from her with great difficulty that she had led a life of hardship and exposure since leaving us, had sometimes been in the extreme of want, but was ashamed to make her situation known to us after having rejected our counsel. So she had gradually been worn down by want and disappointment until this fever seized on her and found an easy victim"—and the fair head drooped with a sigh to the hot forehead that rested against her shoulder.

"Has she asked for nothing?" inquired Seti.

"Not of late. When I first came she wanted water, and asked for it constantly. But the leech said she must not have it. It would chill her and finally make the fever worse. He would only allow her lips to be moistened occasionally with a sponge."

"Her lips are trying to move now. Can you hear anything?"

"Nothing."

Seti stooped and put his ear close to the lips of the dying woman. He shook his head. "Old age," said he, "has its disadvantages, and dull ears are one of them. Perhaps my young friend here can help us"—and he beckoned to Aleph, who had remained at some distance.

The young man at once came forward, and, kneeling by the bed, laid his ear to the twitching lips. For a few moments he seemed not to breathe at all. As Seti looked down on that noble head with its wealth of youth and strength in broad contrast with the sharp, worn features of the sick woman, he said to himself: "It is the head of Horus, the sun-god."

At length Aleph rose. "She says water, water—that and nothing else."

"Give her water, then," commanded Seti.

"But the leech, grandfather!" interposed the maiden, anxiously.

"No matter what the leech says. I too am a leech. Let her drink freely."

Aleph took up the water-jar that was standing by the bed, poured into a large cup that was near till it was almost full, and held it to the lips of the woman—saying to Rachel as he did so: "It is the way of my country." The dry lips closed spasmodically over the rim of the cup, and did not release it until not a drop was left. She opened her eyes. A faint sigh of relief reached the younger ears.

"Give her another cup," said Seti.

She drained that also: then whispered "Heaven," so that they heard, and almost a smile hovered upon her wan features. Great drops stood on her forehead, and she quietly sank into sleep.

"Now lay her down softly," said the Egyptian to the maiden, "and let her sleep. She will do well. What has she eaten?"

"Nothing since I have been here. The leech said that food would not nourish her: it would only nourish the fever."

"Has she never asked for anything in particular?"

"The woman who was here when I came tells me that before nurse became so weak she asked for fried lampreys and onions. But the leech said that she could not ask for a worse dish. It would kill her outright. And, what was worse, it would kill him too; for it would ruin his practice to allow such a thing. It was against all rules."

"Never you mind his rules. Tell the woman—but here she is; I will tell her myself," and he turned toward a peasant woman, who had just softly entered and was standing embarrassed at the presence of strangers. "When this sick person wakes, let her drink all the water she wants. Then ask her if she can think of anything she would like to eat, calling over to her all the eatables you can think of, and whatever she chooses get for her, even though it is fried lampreys or fried dragons. Do you understand?"

"Yes, my lord; but the leech—"

"Will see that these instructions are obeyed. If not, send word at once to this lady. . . . Now, Rachel, you ought to go home at once. Though you are not unaccustomed to such work as this, I can see that you are tired and worn. If you were of the fainting sort I should hold out my arms to catch you from falling—your cheeks are so white and your eyes so—"

She would have fallen had she not hastily staggered toward him and caught his arm. "Yes, grandfather, I think I had better go home as soon as possible," she said in a low and trembling voice. "The closeness of the room till you came, together with the anxiety and excitement, has been too much for me. But the open air will set me right."

"Ought not the lady to have a sedan?" inquired Aleph. "I saw a stand at the last corner as we came."

"Certainly," said Seti: "and where are the two servants, Rachel, who come with you?"

"Are they not at the door! I left them there, to be within call."

"I did not notice them when we came. Did you?"—turning to Aleph.

Aleph shook his head. "Allow me to go for a sedan," said he, "And we will see the lady safely home."

"Thank you—that will do."

Aleph hastened away. During his absence, which was short, Rachel reclined; and on his return with a chair and two stout porters he found her much revived and quite disposed to dismiss the vehicle as being unnecessary. But this Seti would not permit. And she speedily found that he was right; for, on trying to walk to the door, she found it necessary to accept support from both men. But the open air of the street seemed to recall her strength at once, and she entered the sedan without help.

Seti walked before the vehicle to guide. Aleph walked behind—every now and then quieting the motion of the bearers by a word, and once or twice venturing to draw aside the curtain and inquire in a grave, sympathetic way how the lady was enduring the jolting. The answer was satisfactory and cordial: and when the house of Alexander was reached she professed to feel as well and strong as ever, and proved it by darting up the steps without aid. Turning, as the door opened, she threw down thanks and adieu with the gesture of a goddess and disappeared.

"There goes the Gem of Alexandria," murmured Seti to himself.

Aleph said nothing, but he thought that, whatever the gem, it was a wonderfully fine casket that contained it. He was sure that he had never seen a finer. And those eyes! As he turned away the twin stars again ventured to show themselves above his horizon in all their dewy splendors. But what had he to do with a maiden's starry eyes? Just nothing at all. So back the timidly sank to the horizon's edge; but refused to go farther. They must wait till they had burned a path through.

compared experiences. Cimon had revived his acquaintance with the city, but had not found any of his old acquaintances. Thirty years and more had dismissed all of them to new homes or to the Necropolis. No directory made it possible for him to be sure but that, somewhere in the great city, some one whom he had known as a young man was still living with whitening locks; but no doubt nearly all of his generation were dead. That was the way of things in Alexandria: as it is everywhere else.

Cimon was sad that night. O Time, thou mighty thief, when will government apprehend thee and bring thee justice! Or, better still, when will it take thy scythe from thee, and put thee into some reformatory to learn giving instead of stealing, addition instead of subtraction, flowing instead of ebbing, the art of ever setting poor men forward from strength to strength instead of backward from weakness to weakness! Well, that is what will be done some day—for some. For whom?

IV.

THE SYNAGOGUE.

If the reader is curious to know how the two friends passed the long Sabbath morning, before it was time to go to the synagogue, I can inform them. They prayed apart, they prayed together; they produced a copy of the Septuagint and read what the prophets had written about the Messiah. They found many mysteries, and much material for conversation, until the dial in the centre of the court told them that it was time to be moving.

On their way up Emporium Street they kept to the right side for two reasons—because the right was the first reached, and because on that side the current of people was in their own direction. And a current it was. Men, women, and children, with Jewish faces and apparently dressed in their best, in great numbers were leisurely moving northward. Aleph was tall enough to look over the heads of most of the people before him and noticed in the distance the living stream turning into a building. It occurred to him that this building was probably the synagogue of Malus, of which the Alabarch had spoken. He was confirmed in this idea by the light behavior of most about him. The principle of reverence was neither in their feet nor in their faces. And as for their tongues—these seemed to have the freedom of all the days of the week. They were talking shop, talking ships, talking fashions, talking gossip—talking everything but politics and religion. These last topics they prudently left to the Romans and "whom it might concern."

When they came to the synagogue they saw that it was large; though by no means as large and imposing as the Diapleuston. They lingered a little among the many standing on the street in order to get a better view. Just then came a group of persons more richly dressed than the rest, and for whom the rest made way with special deference as they mounted the steps. One of these, whose dress was particularly showy, turned when he had reached the last platform, and looked down among the people as if seeking some one. His eye rested on Aleph. Both Cimon and Aleph noticed an involuntary start. It could hardly have been greater if the man had received an unexpected blow.

He was a man of middle stature, somewhat past middle life, and more than middlingly obese. His face was a curiosity. It was as round as a full moon, and as pocked; but the great peculiarity of it was characterless or wooden expression. It neither laughed nor cried, it neither promised nor threatened, it was neither happy nor miserable, it was neither saint nor sinner. Yet one hesitates a little over this last statement. There was a certain thin, very thin, something about the face that asked to be considered religious. But to the eyes of our friends it seemed sanctimoniousness instead of sanctity, a gauzy white veil which however well worn, is no part of the person and can be put off at pleasure. Perhaps they were mistaken. Sudden judgments sometimes shoot wide of the mark. And it was but a moment they had in which to study his face before he disappeared within the synagogue.

Cimon turned to a by-stander, and asked: "The ruler of the synagogue?" The man bowed assent.

"I wonder," said Cimon, musingly, as they passed on, "whether Malus recognized your father in you. You resemble him strongly—as he was, thirty years ago."

QUESTIONS & ANSWERS

OUR MAIL-BAG.

J. B. Gullison, Bear River City, Utah. 1. What was the mark God set upon Cain? 2. Explain about the land of Nod where Cain got his wife?

There are many matters upon which Scripture is silent, and concerning which there has been no revelation since the Bible was written. Your inquiries are of this category.

S. S. K., Point Judith, R. I. 1. Where can I procure the Life of Harriet Newell and at what cost? 2. What are the National Songs?

1. Perhaps some of our readers may be able to inform you. 2. The national songs are "The Star-Spangled Banner," "Yankee Doodle," and "Columbia, the Gem of the Ocean."

Subscriber, Centre Moreland, Wyoming Co., Pa. Had Christ brothers and sisters in the flesh, as we term it, or were they only spiritual brethren?

We have the evidence of the Jews, who said: "Are not his brethren and sisters still with us? Is not this Joseph, the carpenter's son?" (See also, Matt. 12:46, 47, 49; 13:55; Mark, 3:32; John 2:12; Acts 1:14.)

Subscriber, Salem, N. J. We read that at the Last Supper, Jesus took bread and blessed it; he also took the cup and gave thanks. Is it Scriptural for the pastor to call upon a deacon or a member to ask a blessing on the bread or the cup?

It is unusual, but in evangelical churches, less regard is paid to minute forms than to the spirit of the Communion service.

L. M. Aldrich, Northbridge, Mass. 1. What language would a missionary to Palestine have to learn? 2. Where can text books of the same be procured? 3. Have the Baptists any mission stations there? 4. To whom should a request for prayers to the Fulton Street Prayer Meeting be addressed.

1. Turkish or Arabic, failing which, French, German or English. 2. From the American Board of Foreign Missions, Boston, or the Presbyterian Board of Missions, Philadelphia. 3. No. 4. Address Mr. J. C. Lanphier, 115 Fulton Street, New York.

A. Darms, Franklin, Wis? 1. Did Mohammed act justly in rejecting Christianity, after having come in contact with it, and teaching a monotheistic religion, in order to dethrone idolatry? 2. Was Mohammedanism of any benefit to Christianity, in view of the 80,000 Christians who were killed near Damascus?

1. No man can be said to act justly who rejects Christianity. 2. The early Christians regarded Mohammedanism as a "hammer" sent to punish the Church for its shortcomings. It certainly was of no benefit, unless viewed in this afflictive light. Mohammedanism has been the curse of the world and the enemy of civilization for ages.

R. B. M., Sisson, Cal. Is there a remedy for a state of things in which I am rejected as a juror because I admit that the evidence of a saloon-keeper would have less weight with me than the evidence of a person engaged in another business?

There is no remedy except the abolition of the business of saloon-keeping. The attorney for the saloon-keeper could do no other in the interest of his client than to challenge you after your admission and the judge was probably correct in thinking that your prejudice against the business might prevent your giving an absolutely impartial verdict.

J. K. Z., Green City, Mo. What is the significance of the terms "exchangers" and "Usury" in the Parable Matt. 25:27.

The words are translated "bankers and interest" in the Revised Version. Christ was teaching by familiar illustration. It was not uncommon for an employer to intrust sums of money to his servants to be used in trading or in loans. His words must not be construed as expressing approval of usury. The lesson conveyed is that the talents God has given to men are to be used in his service and that he will call them to account for the use made of them. If the Christian has not done his utmost to serve God with the means at his command, he will not be held guiltless.

M. R. C., Madisonville, Ky. What is usury in the Bible sense of the term? Is it right to charge interest on money loaned?

Usury is oppressive interest, the taking advantage of the necessity of the borrower and charging him a rate of interest calculated not on the value of the loan, but on the urgency of his need. The transaction is perfectly legitimate when the borrower, needing capital in his business or for some definite object, borrows money from those who have it, and pays for the use of it out of his profits. It is then a mutual accommodation and the lender is justified in charging the regular market rate.

If the lender asks a higher rate on account of the risk of his money being lost, or because the borrower for various reasons has not access to funds, then it is usury and the transaction is unchristian even though the borrower is willing to pay the higher rate.

L. B. Decker, Ind. Are justification and sanctification received at the same time? If not, when is the latter received and is it received instantaneously?

Justification is received when the sinner trusts in Christ. Sanctification begins at that time and is a life-long process. It is not instantaneous, though there are times of unusual blessing in the Christian's life when the Spirit is suddenly given in larger measure than before, and he rises to a higher level of insight and is conscious of a large accession of God's grace. There are also seasons of depression, but the trend is in the direction of perfect sanctification.

OUR NEIGHBOR.

WHO is my neighbor, O, dumb and blind!
Have you missed all these years your your chance to be kind To the many that need what you have to give,
To help them a better life to live.

Not always money, but always love?
As full and free as our Father's above.
Is a way the poorest and weakest can show,
Something of heaven in hearts here below.

A love that will reach beyond earthly ties,
And the favored few whose smiles we prize
Out to the fallen on life's highway,
The sin-sick soul that has gone astray,

Pour the oil of kindness upon the wounds
That have long been a stranger to friendly sounds;
Follow with helpful, generous deeds,
For noble acts are better than creeds.

Lead him for shelter, healing and rest
To the Great Physician who gives the best,
The warmest love, the tenderest care.
To the sinner that comes in faith and prayer.
—AGNES J. BEARD.

HIS LOVE.

As flows the river calm and deep
In silence toward the sea
So floweth ever and ceaseth never,
The love of God to me.

What peace he bringeth to my heart,
Deep as the soundless sea,
How sweetly singeth the soul that clingeth,
My loving Lord, to Thee.

How calm at even sinks the sun
Beyond the clouded west;
So tempest-driven, into the haven,
I reach the longed-for rest.

What does "Peculiar" mean? Applied to Hood's Sarsaparilla it means that this medicine is different from others and superior in merit and curative power. Try it and you will know.

TAKE THE HINT.

WHEN'E'R an anxious group is seen Around some monthly magazine
Or paper that is daily whirled
To every quarter of the world,
And merry peals of laughter rise
As this or that attracts the eyes,
The smiling crowd, you may depend,
Above some illustrations bend
That advertise the strength and scope
And purity of IVORY SOAP.

But while they smile or praise bestow
And wonder whence ideas flow,
The fact should still be kept in mind
That people of the knowing kind
Will heed the hints or lessons laid
In rhymes and pictures thus displayed,
And let no precious moments fly
Until the IVORY SOAP they try,
And prove on garments coarse and fine,
The truth of every sketch and line.

WE are IMPORTERS of Tea and Coffee, China and Crockery, and do the largest Tea and Coffee business in Boston (direct with consumers). We also carry a large stock and sell at the lowest possible Cash prices Dinner and Tea Sets, Silver-plated Ware, Lamps, also Lace Curtains and Table Linen (our own importation). To those who take the time and trouble to get up Clubs for Tea, Coffee, Spices and Extracts, we offer premiums. In buying Tea and Coffee from us, you get full value for the money invested and get a premium and you get goods that are direct from the IMPORTERS. If you buy Tea and Coffee from your grocer you pay three or four profits and pay for a premium, but do not get it. In an article published in one of the largest dailies in this country it was claimed the tea bought from the retail grocer showed a profit of 100 per cent. The moral is plain, buy from first hands. We have been doing business in Boston for 17 years, and the publishers of this paper will testify to our undoubted reliability. We do a business of over $300,000 yearly, and our Cash sales of Dinner, Tea and Toilet Sets, Silverware, Lamps, etc., amounted to $59,000 in 1890 aside from our Tea and Coffee sales. Our illustrated Price and Premium List tells the whole story. We like to mail it to all who write for it; it costs you nothing and will interest you. 136 pages.

MACKAY'S LAST ADVICE.

DR. ALEX. MACKAY, whose portrait and life appeared in this journal shortly after his death had prepared just before his last illness a series of articles on the best methods of missionary work in Africa. They embodied the results of a long and laborious experience in Uganda and other difficult spheres. They were found among his effects when they reached his home in Scotland and are now published by an English journal. One of his most weighty utterances is the following:

"The agency by which, and probably by which alone, we can Christianize Africa, is the African himself. But he must first be trained for that work, and trained, too, by the European in Africa. Just as the mountains of ironstone in the continent are perfectly useless until first quarried, smelted, and forged by European tools—so the untrained African mind is absolutely powerless to effect any beneficent results unless first thoroughly trained by those of European tempering. This, too, must be done in Africa itself, for if the European in Africa has proved a difficulty, the African educated in Europe has proved a still more unsuitable instrument for his country's good. It behooved us, therefore, to select with the greatest care a few centres to which Europeans shall have easy access, and where they shall be able to live under comparatively healthy conditions, centres within easy reach of natives within a wide area. None but teachers, born teachers, need expect to be able to train Africans to be teachers in their turn. Unless this point is carefully guarded, it will ever prove a weak link in the chain. It has too often been supposed, because a man is a University graduate, or taken Holy Orders, that, therefore, he knows how to teach. Few greater delusions have prevailed, and Africa has suffered in consequence. . . . It seems to be overlooked by very many apparently zealous advocates of missions that in the command to go and Christianize the nations, we are expressly told the method by which we are to achieve success, namely, by 'teaching them.'"

WHY THE BLESSINGS WERE MISSED.

A LADY who had long been a member of a large and fashionable church, became concerned about her low spiritual condition and was frequently troubled with doubts whether she was a Christian at all. She determined to seek a fresh baptism of the Spirit and for this purpose went to a Convention which was being held in a neighboring church for the deepening of spiritual life. She attended almost all the meetings, but still the blessings seemed to evade her. At the close of the convention she asked a minister who had taken a prominent part in the Convention to come and spend a week at her home. Her offer was accepted, and while staying there he strove to lead her to the fountain of all blessing. One day two ladies called upon his hostess, and were shown into the room adjoining that in which he sat. The visitors were greeted most effusively, and he could hear his friend say, "Why did you not come sooner? You know you ought to call much oftener. I should be so glad to see you." As soon as her visitors were gone, the hostess said to another inmate of the house, "What a nuisance these people are; coming at this time. The minister heard the whole conversation, and, going into the drawing-room to the lady, said, 'I have discovered what is hindering the blessing for which you have been seeking so long and earnestly.' 'What is it?' she replied. He answered, 'I think that very likely God knows that you do not really want the blessing.' 'Why not? I pray for it many times in a day. In fact it is my only prayer now.' 'Yes, but you do not always mean what you say. God knows that.' 'What do you mean?' was the indignant question in reply. The minister reminded her of what he had just heard, and showed her that an inconsistent life was an insuperable bar to the blessing.

THE NEW ENGLAND SUNDAY

FROM THE BOSTON COURIER

"There is a perfect mine of curious and interesting information in 'The Sabbath in Puritan New England,' by Alice Morse Earle. The author has ransacked old records and chronicles with the richest results, and the picture which she gives of the old-time observances of the first day of the week is the most complete that has ever been written. It is one of the most entertaining books that we have ever come upon, and it is of value to every student of New England history. It throws a flood of light upon the past."

In make up: Most baking powders contain ammonia or alum. Cleveland's does not, not a particle; it is composed of pure cream of tartar and bi-carbonate of soda, with a little flour to keep the strength, nothing else. That is why Cleveland's is the most wholesome.

In strength: A rounded teaspoonful of Cleveland's Baking Powder does better work than a heaping teaspoonful of any other; a large saving on a year's bakings. That is why Cleveland's leavens most.

In results: With most baking powders cake is coarse grained, gets dry and "husky;" with Cleveland's, it is fine grained, keeps moist and fresh. That is why Cleveland's leavens best.

By DR. JOSIAH STRONG,

Paper, 30 cts. Cloth, 60 cts.

THE MOST POWERFUL BOOK OF THE CENTURY ON AMERICA.

This revision, which is based on the census of 1890, shows the changes of the last ten years and pictures the religious, social, and economic conditions and tendencies of our country to-day, thus adding to the value of the earlier editions the merit of being the first general application of the revelations of the recent census to the discussions of the great questions of the day. The present edition has been printed from entirely new plates, and enlarged by the addition of more than one-third new matter. Diagrams have also been employed to illustrate some of the more startling facts and comparisons.

AN HISTORIC CHURCH.

The Approaching Celebration of the Fifty-first Anniversary of Bedford Street Methodist Episcopal Church, New York—Its Present and Former Pastors and their Work.

THE old home! Every heart is responsive to the words. The boy who has left it for school or college delights to return to it. The man of middle age, although he may have prospered and acquired a more modern and more elegant dwelling, thinks of the old home with reverence and love, and the aged man finds his memory reverting to it with its tender associations of boyhood days, which seem to be nearer to him than the days of mid-life. Not less dear to the Christian is the sanctuary in which he sat as a boy and where he was born again. The edifice is a sacred one to him, not by reason of any consecration ceremony performed by ecclesiastics with pomp of ritual, but by the prayers offered within its walls, the pleadings of men who, moved by the Spirit, sought to persuade men to be reconciled to God, and still more by the emotions he experienced there in his own soul. It was there that he heard the words uttered which startled him and made him conscious of his own need of a Saviour; thither, hungering for guidance and light, he went to hear the preacher, like Bunyan's Evangelist, tell him the way to the wicket-gate; there the distress and anxiety of his soul were lifted and the peace which passeth understanding took their place, to be with him all through his life, his comfort in sorrow, his strength in trial, and to be his support in the hour of death. The new birth, the beginning of the new life! No wonder that he loves the place in which that life began and he first saw the Light that lighteth the world!

In the hearts of a host of people, not only in this section but in many and distant States, is so enshrined the famous church whose fifty-first anniversary will be celebrated next Sunday. Bedford Street Church, New York, is, among American Methodists, a classic name, associated with eminent fathers of Methodism and endeared by memories of marvellous outpourings of the Spirit, of which it has been the scene. And its memories are not confined even to that period. They embrace the older edifice of which it is the successor. That church, a picture of which forms the initial of this page was built in 1810 when Methodism in America was only forty-four years old. A fine new church it seemed to the congregation that moved into it from the carpenter's shop, where, before that time, it had been worshipping. There was no longer any need for Brother Wallgrove, the carpenter, to cease work at noon on Saturdays, clear away his lumber and tools, sweep the floor, and bring in planks to seat the fifty or sixty persons who would fill the shop at the next day's services. The church had now a home of its own, built on five lots on the corner of Bedford and Morton Streets—land bought at two hundred and fifty dollars a lot. It was a little out of the way, but the ministers who came from a distance to preach, and the families who came to hear, were accompanied after the night-service by a volunteer guard of the young men of the congregation, who saw them safely through the desolate country then lying between the church and Broadway. They were proud of their church. Its sides were shingled, and painted cream color. It had a high box pulpit with a sounding board which Freeborn Garrison split in twain when he brought his hands down on it in vigorous declamation. It had straight-backed pews good for earnest hearers, but uncomfortable for sleepers. Its floor was regularly sanded, and at night candles of the penny dip variety shed their illumination on the scene. But souls were saved there and the congregation grew and flourished.

For thirty years the congregation worshipped in its fine new church. One evening in 1840, the pastor, Rev. Phineas Rice, whose portrait is here given, preached from the text: "The place is too strait for me; give place to me that I may dwell." (Isa. 49: 20.) That was the last sermon preached in that edifice. Services were held temporarily country. By November 19, it was ready for occupation and it was formally dedicated, Bishop Hedding preaching the dedication sermon. That is the edifice now in use, a picture of which appears on this page.

The pastor at the time was Phineas Rice, fifty-four years old and thirty years in the ministry. He had been a Calvinistic Baptist, but at the age of twenty he quitted that communion for the church to which belonged the preacher who had been instrumental in his conversion. In 1807, the minutes of the New York Conference record the acceptance of the young man, who was described as, "pious, clear of debt, sound in doctrine, and zealous." Each one a quality desirable in a minister. In 1809, his name again appears on the minutes. His brethren had by that time had the benefit of two years' acquaintance with him. They made another effort to describe his character. It may be supposed that he was still as pious and zealous and had not got into debt, but the Conference this time, does not say so, being possibly satcon's orders." The good man was an earnest and successful preacher and doubtless was not liked by his hearers any the less for the quaint, humorous remarks which led his brethren to describe him as "a little funny." Bedford Street prospered under his ministry though he admitted that he "had preached the church down to its foundation and a new church up and had reduced its membership from nine hundred to seven hundred of whom there were still two hundred whom he was quite willing to part with to any one who wanted them. Apparently a man of Gideon's temperament was this worthy pastor who wanted no one around him but men in earnest and ready to work. But if he had, as he appears to have thought, five hundred such persons in membership, he must have had a force with which a great deal of good could be done.

Benjamin Griffin was Mr. Rice's successor, and among the pastors who followed were several whose names become famous in the Church: Laban C. Cheney, O. V. Amerman, Seymour Van Deusen, Jarvis Z. Nichols, John P. Newman, John E. Cookman, William H. Ferris, Elias S. Osborn, George Van Alstyne, W. McKendee Darwood and James S. Chadwick are a few of the names on the list of the Church's pastors.

As the city grew, and that "desolate country between Bedford Street and Broadway," previously mentioned, became covered with dwellings so completely that every available inch of ground was occupied, the old church thrived and became a power for good in the district. It was a church for the masses, a place where if a man went as one of the masses, he was apt to discover that he must appear as an individual before the bar of God, and he would learn, too, that Christ was ready to save him personally, no matter how humble and insignificant he might be. A competent authority states that from the time of the church's origin to the present day, the number of sinners who have been brought to Christ in that building has not averaged less than one hundred persons a year. Some of these remained there to work for the Lord, but many went to other cities to carry there the good news which had transformed them. One friend of the church and a zealous worker in its Sunday School had occasion only recently to visit a distant city, and employed a hackman to drive him to the various places he wished to call at. ## THE TEMPLE OF DIANA.

Dr. Talmage's latest Sunday morning Sermon, the Fifth of the Series entitled, "From the Pyramids to the Acropolis." Text: "Great is Diana of the Ephesians." Acts 19 : 34.

WE have landed this morning at Smyrna, a city of Asiatic Turkey. One of the seven churches of Asia once stood here. You read in Revelation, "To the church in Smyrna write." It is a city that has often been shaken by earthquake, swept by conflagration, blasted by plagues, and butchered by war, and here Bishop Polycarp stood in a crowded amphitheatre and when he was asked to give up the advocacy of the Christian religion and save himself from martyrdom, the pro-consul saying: "Swear and I release thee; reproach Christ," replied: "Eighty and six years have I served him, and he never did me wrong; how then can I revile my King and Saviour?" When he was brought to the fires into which he was about to be thrust, and the officials were about to fasten him to the stake, he said: "Let me remain as I am for he who giveth me strength to sustain the fire will enable me also without your securing me with nails to remain unmoved in the fire." History says the fires refused to consume him, and under the winds the flames bent outward so that they did not touch his person, and, therefore he was slain by swords and spears. One cypress bending over his grave is the only monument to Bishop Polycarp.

But we are on the way to the city of Ephesus. We must see Ephesus—associated with the most wonderful apostolic scenes. We hire a special railway train, and in about an hour and a half we arrive at the city of Ephesus, which was called "The Great Metropolis of Asia," and "One of the eyes of Asia," and "The Empress of Ionia," the capital of all learning and magnificence. Here, as I said, was one of the seven churches of Asia, and first of all we visit the ruins of that church where once an Ecumenical Council of two thousand ministers of religion was held.

Mark the fulfilment of the prophecy! Of the seven churches of Asia, four were commended in the book of Revelation, and three were doomed. The cities having the four commended churches still stand; the cities having the three doomed churches are wiped out. It occurred just as the Bible said it would occur. Drive on and you come to the theatre, which was 660 feet from wall to wall, capable of holding 56,700 spectators. Here and there the walls arise almost unbroken, but for the most part the building is down. Just enough of it is left to help the imagination build it up as it was when those audiences shouted and clapped at some great spectacular. Their huzzas must have been enough to stun the heavens. Standing there, we could not forget that in that building once assembled a riotous throng for Paul's condemnation, because what he preached collided with the idolatry of their national goddess. Paul tried to get into that theatre and address the excited multitude, but his friends held him back, lest he be torn in pieces by the mob, and the Recorder of the city had to read the Riot Act among the people who had shrieked for two mortal hours till their throats were sore and they were black in the face: "Great is Diana of the Ephesians."

Now, we step into the Stadium. Enough of its walls and appointments are left to show what a stupendous place it must have been when used for foot races and for fights with wild beasts. It was a building 680 feet long by 200 feet wide. Paul refers to what transpired there in the way of spectacle when he says, "We have been made a spectacle." Yes, Paul says, "I have fought with beasts at Ephesus," an expression usually taken as figurative, but I suppose it was literally true, for one of the amusements in that Stadium was to put a disliked man in struggle of Paul with a wild beast. The coolest man in the Stadium is Paul. What has he to fear? He has defied all the powers, earthly and infernal, and if his body tumble under the foot and tooth of the wild beast, his soul will only the sooner find disenthralment. But it is his duty, as far as possible, to preserve his life. Now, I hear the bolt of the wild beast's door shove back, and the whole audience rise to their feet as the fierce brute springs for the arena and toward its small occupant. But the little missionary has his turn of making attack, and with a few well-directed thrusts the monster lies dead in the dust of the arena, and the Apostle puts his right foot on the lion and shakes him, and then puts his left foot on him and shakes him—a scene which Paul afterwards uses for an illustration when he wants to show how Christ will triumph over death—"He must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet;" yes, under his feet. Paul told the literal truth when he said: "I have fought with beasts at Ephesus," and as the plural is used I think he had more than one such fight, or several beasts were let loose upon him at one time. As we stood that day in the middle of the Stadium and looked around at the great structure, the whole scene came back upon us.

But, we pass out of the Stadium for we are in haste for other places of interest in Ephesus. To add to the excitement of the day one of our party was missing. No man is safe in that region alone unless he be armed and know how to take gymnasia, its hippodrome, its odeon, its athenaeum, its forum, its aqueducts (whose skeletons are still strewn along the city), its towers, its castle of Hadrian, its monument of Androclus, its quarries, which were the granite cradle of cities, its temples, built to Apollo, to Minerva, to Neptune, to Mercury, to Bacchus, to Hercules, to Cæsar, to Fortune, to Jupiter Olympus. What history and poetry and chisel and canvas have not presented has come up at the call of archæologists' powder-blast and crowbar.

But I have now to unveil the chief wonder of this chiefest of cities. In 1863, under the patronage of the English Government, Mr. Wood, the explorer, began at Ephesus to feel along under the ground at great depths for roads, for walls, for towers, and here it is—that for which Ephesus was more celebrated than all else beside—the temple of the goddess Diana, called the sixth wonder of the world, and in 1889 we stood amid the ruins of that temple, measuring its pillars, transfixed by its sculpture, and confounded at what was the greatest temple of idolatry in all time. As I sat on a piece of one of its fallen columns, I said, "what earthquake rocked it down, or what hurricane pushed it to the earth, or under what strong wine of centuries did the giant stagger and fall?" There have been seven temples of Diana, the ruins of each contributing something for the splendor of all its architectural successors. Two hundred and twenty years was this last temple in construction. Twice as long as the United States have stood was that temple in building. It was nearly twice as large as St. Paul's Cathedral, London. Lest it should be disturbed by earthquakes, which have always been fond of making those regions their play ground, the temple was built on a marsh, which was made firm by layers of charcoal covered by fleeces of wool. The stone came from the quarry nearby. After it was decreed to build the temple, it was thought it would be necessary to bring the building stone from other lands, but one day a shepherd by the name of Pixodorus, while watching his flocks, saw two rams fighting, and as they missed the interlocking of their horns and one fell, his horn knocked a splinter from the rock and showed by that splinter the lustrous whiteness of the rock. The shepherd ran to the city with a piece of that stone, which revealed a quarry from which place the temple was built, and every month in all ages since, the Mayor of Ephesus goes to that quarry to offer sacrifices to the memory of that shepherd who discovered this source of splendor and wealth for the cities of Asia Minor. In removing the great stones from the quarry to their destined places in the temple, it was necessary, in order to keep the wheels, which were twelve feet in diameter, from sinking deep into the earth under the unparalleled heft, that a frame of timbers be arranged over which the wheels rolled. To put the immense block of marble in its place over the doorway of one of these temples was so vast and difficult an undertaking, that the architect at one time gave it up, and in his chagrin intended suicide, but one night in his sleep he dreamt that the stone had settled to the right place, and the next day he found that the great block of marble had by its own weight settled to the right place. The temple of Diana was four hundred and twenty-five feet long by two hundred and twenty feet wide. All Asia was taxed to pay for it. It had one hundred and twenty-seven pillars, each sixty feet high, and each the gift of a king, and inscribed with the name of the donor. Now you see the meaning of that passage in Revelation, just as a king presenting one of these pillars to the temple of Diana had his own name chiselled on it and the name of his own country, so says Christ: "Him that overcometh will I make a pillar in the temple of my God, and I will write upon him the name of my God and the name the arena with a hungry lion or tiger or panther, and let the fight go on until either the man or the beast or both were slain. And was there ever a more unequal combat proposed? Paul, according to tradition, small, crooked-backed and weak-eyed, but the grandest man in sixty centuries, is led to the centre, as the people shout: "There he comes, the preacher who has nearly ruined our religion. The lion will make but a brief mouthful of him." It is plain that all the sympathies of that crowd are with the lion. In one of the underground rooms I hear the growl of the wild beasts. They have been kept for several days without food or water in order that they may be especially ravenous and bloodthirsty. What chance is there for Paul? But you cannot tell by a man's size or looks how stout a blow he can strike or how keen a blade he can thrust. Witness, heaven and earth and hell, this sure aim and not miss fire. Our companion, Dr. Louis Klopsch, now the publisher of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, had gone out on some explorations of his own, and through the gate where Paul had walked again and again, yet, where no man unaccompanied should adventure now. But, after some time had passed, and every minute seemed as long as an hour, and we had time to imagine everything horrible in the way of robbery and assassination, the lost traveller appeared, to receive from our entire party a volley of expostulation for the arousal of so many anxieties.

In the midst of this city of Ephesus once floated an artificial lake, brilliant with painted boats, and through the River Cayster it was connected with the sea, and ships from all parts of the known earth floated in and out carrying on a commerce which made Ephesus the envy of the world. Great was Ephesus! Its of the city of my God, which is New Jerusalem, and I will write upon him my new name." How suggestive and beautiful!

In addition to those pillars that I climbed over while amid the ruins of Diana's Temple, I saw afterwards eight of those pillars at Constantinople, to which city they had been removed, and are now a part of the Mosque of St. Sophia. Those eight columns are all green jasper, but some of those which stood in Diana's Temple at Ephesus were fairly drenched with brilliant colors. Costly metals stood up in various parts of the Temple, where they could catch the fullest flush of the sun. A flight of stairs was carved out of one grape vine. Doors of cypress wood, which had been kept in glue for years and bordered with bronze in bas-relief, swung against pillars of brass, and resounded with echo upon echo, caught up, and sent on, and buried back through the corridors. In that building stood an image of Diana, the goddess. The impression was abroad as the Bible records, that that image had dropped plumb out of heaven into that Temple, and the sculptors who really made the statue or image were put to death, so that they could not testify of its manufacture and so deny its celestial origin. But the material out of which the image of Diana was fashioned contradicted that notion. This image was carved out of ebony and punctured here and there with openings kept full of spikenard so as to hinder the statue from decaying and make it aromatic, but this ebony was covered with bronze and alabaster. A necklace of acorns coiled gracefully around her. There were four lions on each arm, typical of strength. Her head was coronetted. Around this figure stood statues which by wonderful invention shed tears. The air by strange machinery was damp with descending perfumes. The walls multiplied the scene by concave mirrors. Fountains tossed in sheaves of light and fell in showers of diamonds. One painting in that temple cost $193,750. The treasures of all nations and the spoils of kingdoms were kept here for safe deposit. Criminals from all lands fled to the shelter of this temple, and the law could not touch them. It seemed almost strange that this mountain of architectural snow outside did not melt with the fires of color within. The temple was surrounded with groves, in which roamed for the temptation of hunters, stags and hares and wild boars, and all styles of game, whether winged or four-footed. There was a cave with statue so intensely brilliant that it extinguished the eyes of those who looked upon it, unless, at the command of the priests, the hand of the spectator somewhat shaded the eyes. No wonder that even Anthony and Alexander and Darius cried out in the words of my text: "Great is Diana of the Ephesians."

One month of each year, the month of May, was devoted to her worship. Processions in garbs of purple and violet and scarlet moved through it, and there were torches, and anthems, and choirs in white, and timbrels and triangles in music, sacrifices and dances. Here young men and maidens were betrothed with imposing ceremony. Nations voted large amounts to meet the expense of the worship. Fisheries of vast resource were devoted to the support of this splendence. Horace and Virgil and Homer went into rhapsodies while describing this worship. All artists, all archaeologists, all centuries, agreed in saying: "Great is Diana of the Ephesians." Paul in the presence of this Temple of Diana incorporates it in his figures of speech while speaking of the spiritual temple. "Now, if any man build upon this foundation, gold, silver, precious stones, &c.," and no doubt with reference to one of the previous Temples which had been set on fire by Herostratus just for the fame of destroying it, Paul says: "If any man's work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss, &c.," and all up and down Paul's writings you realize, that he had not only seen, but had been mightily impressed with what he had seen of the Temple of Diana.

In this city the mother of Jesus was said to have been buried. Here dwelt Aquilla and Priscilla of Bible mention, who were professors in an extemporized theological seminary, and they taught the eloquent Apollos how to be eloquent for Christ. Here John preached, and from here because of his fidelity he was exiled to Patmos. Here Paul warred against the magical arts for which Ephesus was famous. The sorcerers of this city pretended that they could cure diseases, and perform almost any miracle, by pronouncing these senseless words: "Aski Cataski Lix Tetra Damna mēnus Aision." Paul having performed a miracle in the name of Jesus, there was a lying family of seven brothers who imitated the Apostle, and instead of their usual words of incantation, used the word Jesus over a man who was possessed of a devil, and the man possessed flew at them in great fierceness and nearly tore these frauds to pieces, and in consequence all up and down the streets of Ephesus there was indignation excited against the magical arts, and a great bonfire of magical books was kindled in the streets, and the people stirred the blaze until thirty-five thousand dollars worth of black art literature had burned to ashes.

But, all the glory of Ephesus I have described has gone now. At some seasons of the year awful malarias sweep over the place and put upon mattress or in graves a large portion of the population. In the approximate marshes scorpions, centipedes and all forms of reptilian life crawl and hiss and sting, while hyenas and jackals at night sink in and out of the ruins of buildings which once startled the nations with their almost supernatural grandeur.

But here is a lesson which has never yet been drawn out. Do you not see in that Temple of Diana an expression of what the world needs? It wants a God who can provide food. Diana was a huntress. In pictures on many of the coins she held a stag by the horn with one hand and a bundle of arrows in the other. Oh, this is a hungry world! Diana could not give one pound of meat, or one mouthful of food to the millions of her worshippers. She was a dead divinity, an imaginary God, and so in idolatrous lands the vast majority of people never have enough to eat. It is only in the countries where the God of heaven and earth is worshipped that the vast majority have enough to eat. Let Diana have her arrows and her hounds; our God has the sunshine and the showers and the harvests, and in proportion as he is worshipped does plenty reign.

So also in the Temple of Diana the world expressed its need of a refuge. To it from all parts of the land came debtors who could not pay their debts and the offenders of the law that they might escape incarceration. But, she sheltered them only a little while, and while she kept them from arrest she could not change their hearts and the guilty remained guilty. But, our God in Jesus Christ is a refuge into which we may fly from all our sins and all our pursuers, and not only be safe for time but safe for eternity, and the guilt is pardoned and the nature is transformed. What Diana could not do for her worshippers, our Christ accomplishes for us.

Rock of ages cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in thee.

Then, in that Temple were deposited treasures from all the earth for safe keeping. Chrysostom says it was the treasure-house of nations; they brought gold and silver and precious stones and coronets from across the sea, and put them under the care of Diana of the Ephesians. But, again and again were those treasures ransacked, captured or destroyed. Nero robbed them, the Scythians scattered them, the Goths burned them.

Diana failed those who trusted her with treasures, but our God, to him we may entrust all our treasures for this world and the next, and fail any one who puts confidence in him he never will. After the last jasper column has fallen and the last temple on earth has gone into ruins and the world itself has suffered demolition, the Lord will keep for us our best treasures.

But, notice what killed Ephesus, and what has killed most of the cities that lie buried in the cemetery of nations. Luxury! The costly baths, which had been the means of health to the city, became its ruin. Instead of the cold baths that had been the invigoration of the people, the hot baths, which are only intended for the infirm or the invalid, were substituted. In these hot baths many lay most of the time. Authors wrote books while in these baths. Business was neglected and a hot bath taken four or five times a day. When the keeper of the baths was reprimanded for not having them warm enough, one of the rulers said: "You blame him for not making the bath warm enough; I blame you because you have it warm at all." But that warm bath which enervated Ephesus, and which is always enervating except when followed by cold baths (no reference, of course, to delicate constitutions), was only a type of what went on in all departments of Ephesian life, and in luxurious indulgence Ephesus fell, and the last triangle of music was tinkled in Diana's Temple, and the last wrestler disappeared from her gymnasiums, and the last racer took his garland in the Stadium, and the last plea was heard in her Forum, and, even the sea, as if to withdraw the last commercial opportunity from that metropolis, retreated down the beach, leaving her without the harbor in which had floated a thousand ships. Brooklyn, New York, London and all modern cities, cis-Atlantic and trans-Atlantic! take warning. What luxury unguarded did for Ephesus, luxury unguarded may do for all. Opulence and splendor God grant to all the people, to all the cities, to all the lands, but at the same time, may he grant the righteous use of them.

Gymnasiums? Yes, but see that the vigor gained in them be consecrated to God. Magnificent temples of worship? Yes, but see that in them instead of conventionalities and cold pomp of service, there be warmth of devotion and the pure Gospel preached. Imposing court houses? Yes, but in them let justice and mercy rule. Palaces of journalism? Yes, but let all of the printing presses be marshalled for happiness and truth. Great post office buildings? Yes, but through them day by day, may correspondence helpful, elevating and moral pass. Ornate dwelling houses? Yes, but in them let there be altars of devotion, and conjugal, filial, paternal and Christian fidelity rule. London for magnitude, Berlin for Universities: Paris for Fashions: Rome for Cathedrals: Athens for classics: Thebes for hieroglyphics: Memphis for tombs: Babylon for gardens: Ephesus for idolatry, but what shall be the characteristics of our American cities when they shall have attained their full stature? Would that "Holiness to the Lord" might be inscribed upon all our municipalities. One thing is certain, and that is that all idolatry must come down. When the greatest goddess of the earth, Diana, enshrined in the greatest Temple that ever stood, was prostrated at Ephesus, it was a prophecy of the overthrow of all the idolatries that have cursed the earth, and anything we love more than God is an idol, and there is as much idolatry in the Nineteenth Century as in the First, and in America as in Asia.

As our train pulled out from the station at Ephesus, the cars surrounded by the worst looking group of villains I ever gazed on, all of them seeming in a wrangle with each other and trying to get into a wrangle with us, and we moved along the columns of ancient aqueducts, each column crowned with storks, having built their nests there, and we rolled on down towards Smyrna, and that night in a Sailors' Bethel, we spoke of the Christ whom the world must know or perish, we felt that between cradle and grave there could not be anything much more enthralling for body, mind, and soul, than our visit to Ephesus.

A LEAF ON A DEAD HAND.

VERY pathetic is the story told by an English officer who served in the Crimean war. He says that after the battle of Inkermann, when they were burying the dead, they found the body of a soldier who had been fatally wounded, but had sufficient strength to crawl to a place of shelter to die. When his corpse was lifted reverently by his comrades it was found that his hand was resting on an open pocket Bible. The officer looked at the page and found that it was the eleventh chapter of John's gospel, in which are the words: "I am the resurrection and the life," etc. The man's blood had flowed and congealed in the frosty air so that as his body was raised the leaf adhered to his hand and was torn out of the book. He was buried with the leaf still there—a mute pledge of the resurrection.

CHRIST BEFORE PILATE.

S. S. Lesson For Nov. 29. By Mrs M. Baxter:
John 19: 1-16. Golden Text, Rom. 4: 25.

IT was no easy task which the chief priests and elders of the people had undertaken in seeking to prove a criminal charge against Jesus, the Son of God. He had stood his trial before the ecclesiastical court, and, although he made no defence, and answered not a word, nothing could be proved against him. He "did no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth." All they could do was to hand him over to the civil authorities, and this they did without delay. And thus it came to pass that Jesus, the Son of the living God, stood accused before a heathen governor. But he stood there, not for himself, but as our Representative.

"What accusation bring ye against this man?" was the necessary question with which the proceedings opened. "If this man were not an evildoer, we should not have delivered him up to thee," (R. V.) was the answer. But such an answer conveyed no direct charge, and the governor, understanding the true state of the case, appealed to the prosecutor to take the case out of court: "Take ye him, and judge him according to your law." But this did not answer the purpose of the persecuting chief priests, they aimed at nothing less than the death of him whom they hated because of his power, his holiness, and the influence which he exerted among the people. Therefore they objected: "It is not lawful for us to put any man to death." How little they knew that in this very objection they fulfilled his own prophecy that he should be delivered into the hands of the Gentiles! Thus they were ignorantly strengthening his cause.

Their only hope of enlisting the civil authority on their side was to prove Jesus a political offender. They must have suggested to Pilate that he was dangerous to the government. Thus Pilate addressed him, saying: "Art thou the King of the Jews?" Jesus knew the treachery of those who prosecuted him. His heart, even at that moment, was going out after souls, he saw Pilate's soul just balancing in the scale, and asked him: "Sayest thou this thing of thyself, or did others tell it thee of me?" "Am I a Jew?" the judge retorted. "Thine own nation, and the chief priests have delivered thee unto me: what hast thou done?" The governor was accustomed to hear charges of robbery, murder, insurrection and other crimes. But here was a prisoner against whom no charge was laid, but that a rabble, amongst whom many were children, had followed Jesus, mounted on a young ass, into Jerusalem, and cried, "Hosanna to the Son of David." And Jesus had allowed them to salute him thus! Pilate could see no danger to the government in this spontaneous and humble tribute of gratitude and homage to their benefactor. Jesus answered:

"My Kingdom is not of this World:

if my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight that I should not be delivered to the Jews, but now is my kingdom not from hence." A kingdom, but not of this world, consisting, not of broad acres, not of populous towns, not of mighty armies—a kingdom in which earthly power was at a discount—this was incomprehensible to Pilate! He had heard of the miracles done by this man, and how he served the poor as willingly or more so than the rich, expecting and taking no reward, how he shunned earthly honor, how his followers were the most harmless of the populace; and now he declares that his policy is one of non-resistance, that he and his servants will not fight that he may be delivered from the Jews;—never had Pilate such a prisoner to deal with! But Pilate's prisoner is our example; his policy is ours. It is not for the followers of Christ to strive. We do not come out of our difficulties by resisting, but by enduring; the way of deliverance for us is ever God-made, not self-made.

"Art thou a king then?" said Pilate. "Thou sayest that I am a king. To this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness unto the truth. Everyone that is of the truth heareth my voice." More and more Pilate was conscious that he had no ordinary criminal, no ordinary man, to deal with: money, honor, power, which most men strive for and sin to gain, were no object to this man, so vehemently accused, yet so manifestly innocent, whose kingly sceptre reigned over a kingdom of truth. Pilate was at sea—worldly men always are at sea—regarding a question of truth, and he asked him, "What is truth?" O, had Pilate waited for the answer, and had he yielded himself to him who is "the way, the truth, and the life," he never would have figured in all the creeds of Christendom, in terrible juxtaposition to the crucified Son of God, in those well-known words, "he suffered under Pontius Pilate!" But he was judge; he must give sentence; he went out unto the Jews and said: "I find in him no fault at all. But ye have a custom that I should release unto you one at the pass-over: will ye therefore that I release unto you the King of the Jews?" Alas for the answer: "Not this man, but Barabbas."

Anyone, but not Jesus!

"Barabbas was a robber." What is it in human nature which shrinks instinctively from close contact with Jesus? Why was it that the high priest was glad to get him off his hands? Why was it that Herod, when he was brought before him, "sent him again to Pilate?" Why was it that Pilate sought, by every means in his power, to get rid of the responsibility of condemning or acquitting him? Why was it that the worst and most dangerous character was welcomed by the Jewish authorities rather than that Jesus should be set at liberty? Why is it that now men of the world will go anywhere to avoid a personal interview with a man who lives much in the presence of Jesus? Is it not because the presence of Jesus makes manifest all things as they are? "Whatsoever doth make manifest is light." "Every one that doeth evil hateth the light, neither cometh to the light, lest his deeds should be reproved." Men are discovered in the presence of Jesus, his holy light shines through that which they can hide from their fellow creatures, and from their own selves. Jesus is always the Prophet, and the searcher of hearts, until he gets our consent to be the Saviour.

Human Nature

does not like to be brought to book. "The heart is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked," and yet it dresses itself up in smiles and fair speeches, until it has persuaded itself that it is not so bad after all! There is something of the Pharisee about most men by nature, and the word of Jesus is applicable to most unrenowned men and women: "Ye are like unto whited sepulchres which indeed appear beautiful outward, but are within full of dead men's bones and of all uncleanness. Even so ye also outwardly appear righteous unto men, but within ye are full of hypocrisy and iniquity." Our natural hearts are full of unbelief in God, and possess an instinctive dread of coming to close quarters with Him. "The carnal mind is enmity against God, for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed, can be." (Rom. 8: 7.)

"Then Pilate therefore took Jesus, and scourged him, still uncondemned. It was gratuitous suffering which was heaped on him. It needed the eye of faith to see, when they crowned him with thorns, how, in very deed, he wore as his crown of glory the very sufferings which came out of the curse of sin. These thorns were the insignia of his Kingship over sin, disease, misery, death. No other sceptre can reign in such a world, over such an empire, but God hath "put all things under his feet" and he has all power over this dominion caused by the fall.

In mockery, the ignorant soldiers cried "Hail, King of the Jews;" but Pilate? what of him? Weak man that he was, he swayed between the desire to retain the favor of the people and the twinges of conscience which assailed him, for having acted unjustly to an innocent man. He went forth again to them, and said: "Behold, I bring him forth to you, that ye may know that I find no fault in him." It was the second time he had made this assertion, and yet he dared not act upon it. He brought forth Jesus, arrayed in regal purple, but with a crown of thorns, and said:

"Behold the Man."

"Crucify him, crucify him" was the only answer from the Chief Priest's party. "Take ye him and crucify him: for I find no fault in him," was Pilate's reply. But he could not thus easily get Jesus off his hands. The Jews replied: "We have a law, and by our law he ought to die, because he made himself the Son of God." The timid Pilate "was still more afraid," and asked his Prisoner: "Whence art thou? But Jesus gave him no answer, and the governor said: "Speakest thou not unto me? Knowest thou not that I have power to crucify thee, and have power to release thee?" Jesus answered: "Thou couldst have no power at all against me, except it were given thee from above: therefore he that delivered me unto thee hath the greater sin." The Prisoner pronounced on the sin of the Judge! Was ever such a trial?

Pilate made every effort to extricate himself from his dilemma, and release Jesus. But he could only do it by a decisive action. It was in his power, he might have done it, but he feared for his popularity and for his standing with the emperor. His soul was nearly won, when the Jews cried: "If thou let this Man go, thou art not Cæsar's friend: whosoever maketh himself a king speaketh against Cæsar." The die was cast, the wretched man became a tool of the enemy, self interest won the day, and he yielded: "Behold your King." "Away with him, away with him," was the fierce reply. "Shall I crucify your King?" "We have no king but Cæsar." And thus Pilate was overcome, and committed for execution him whom he knew to be innocent, and whom he saw and felt to be possessed of a power which was not of man! And this mock trial, this condemnation for things that he knew not, Jesus accepted at his Father's hand, to save us from real trial before the bar of God, and the condemnation which we have merited, O how justly. "He was delivered for our offences."

LESSON POINTS.

Especially Adapted to the Requirements of the Desk.

WHEN Pilate therefore took Jesus and scourged him, Pilate vacillated. He knew Jesus to be innocent and entirely undeserving of punishment. Had he then and there acted up to his convictions he would to-day occupy one of the proudest positions in the world's history. But he hesitated, he sought to compromise, he thought by inflicting a little punishment the pity of the Jews would be aroused, their wrath appeased, and the prisoner liberated. But he had miscalculated, and having gone one step in the wrong direction he opened the way for the perpetration of the most outrageous crime ever committed. From this let us learn that vacillation or indecision or moral cowardice is sin and that our only safeguard lies in the moral courage to do our whole duty even under the most trying circumstances, for "he that knoweth the right and doeth it not shall be beaten with many stripes."

Chrysostom, before the Roman Emperor, was a beautiful example of true moral courage. The Emperor threatened him with banishment, if he still remained a Christian. Chrysostom replied: "Thou canst not, for the world is my Father's house; thou canst not banish me." "But I will slay thee," said the Emperor. "Nay, but thou canst not," said the noble champion of the true faith, again, "for my life is hid with Christ in God!" "I will take away thy treasures." "Nay, but thou canst not," was the retort, "for I have more than thou knowest of. My treasure is in heaven, and my heart is there." "But I will drive thee away from man, and thou shalt have no friend left." "Nay, and that thou canst not," once more said the faithful witness, "for I have a Friend in heaven, from whom thou canst not separate me. I defy thee, there is nothing thou canst do to hurt me."

If thou let this man go thou art not Cæsar's friend. The time for decision had now come as it comes to every man. Shall it be Christ or Cæsar—Christ or the world—right or wrong. In every life there is a time when we come to the forks of the road and a decision that determines destiny must be made, and made at once. It may involve sacrifices of a most serious character, but it must be made. Have we the courage to decide for the right no matter what the consequences?

Mr. Moody tells of a boy, the son of drinking and godless parents, who would not allow him to attend either church or Sunday School. But one day he got into one of Mr. Moody's meetings and a kind-hearted man pointed him to Christ. Now, when Christ gets into a boy's heart that boy cannot help but pray. The father came home one night under the influence of drink and heard his son praying. He went to him and said, "I don't want you to pray any more. You have been to some of those Christian meetings, and if I hear you pray again I'll flog the life out of you." But the boy was filled with God and he couldn't help praying. The door of communication was opened between him and Christ, and his father caught him praying again. In a great rage he shook him and said: "Didn't I tell you never to pray again? If I catch you at it once more, you'll leave my house." He thought that would stop him. It was a time of sore trial. The boy had to decide between Christ and his home, but it did not take him long to determine his course. Not long after this his father had been drinking more than usual, and coming home found his son offering up prayer. He caught the boy in his grasp and said, "Didn't I tell you never to pray again, you canting little hypocrite? Get your things packed and leave the house." The little fellow hadn't many things to pack—a drunkard's boy never has—and before leaving the house he went to his mother's room. "Good-bye mother," said he. "Where are you going?" inquired she. "I don't know where I'll go, but father says I cannot stay here any longer because I have been praying," he replied. The mother knew it wouldn't do for her to try to keep the boy when her husband had ordered him away, so she drew him to her bosom and kissed him and bade him good-bye. He went to his brothers and sisters and amid many tears kissed them good-bye also. When he came to the door his father was there and the little fellow reached out his hand and, saying, "Good-bye, father, I'll pray for you as long as I live," he left the house, humming:

Jesus, I my cross have taken,
All to leave, and follow thee;
Naked, poor, despised, forsaken,
Thou from hence, my all shalt be;
Perish every fond ambition,
All I've sought, or hoped, or known,
Yet how rich is my condition!
God and heaven are still my own.

He hadn't been gone many minutes before that father came to himself. He rushed after his boy and when he had found him cried out: "Come back my boy; if religion is dearer to you than home and parents, I want to have it myself."

NOOR MAHAL'S PERIL.

A Story of the Sunday School Golden Text for Nov. 29.

AKBAR, the wisest of the Moghuls of India, whose reign, nearly three centuries ago, is still enshrined in Hindoo history as one of the most brilliant that ancient empire, had conquered the beautiful kingdom of Cashmere. He built the famous palace of white marble at Agra, which was known all over the world as the white palace of Fethipoor-Shikri. He was the first of the Moslem monarchs to accord a hearing to the Christian missionaries who were sent to Agra by the Bishop of Goa, and he was also the first to institute free public schools in India. When Akbar died, his son Selim, better known as Jehan Ghir, "The Conqueror," interred the dead monarch in a magnificent mosque and reigned in his stead.

At that time, India was a land of Mohammedans, Brahmins and fire-worshippers. Christians were without influence, until Noor Mahal, the daughter of a poor Persian nobleman—a young girl of a most sweet and lovable nature—became the wife of Jehan Ghir. This gentle being exercised a more potential influence in the Mohammedan court than was ever before known in the kingdom of the Moghuls. So wise, refined and noble was her mind, that she was known throughout the whole kingdom as "The Light of the Palace." Born a Parsee, a Moslem by marriage, she yet listened eagerly to the words of the missionaries who had free audience, and showed a deep interest in the message they brought.

Jehan Ghir, the king, was a man of blood with many crimes on his head, committed before he had married his gentle spouse. A rebellion arose in the kingdom and Mohabat Khan, a powerful noble, took the king prison-led the traveller to ask him about his life. "Oh!" said the hackman, "I never go to saloons, I have been a Christian man for more than twenty years. I was converted at Old Bedford Street Church in New York." It was apparently a conversion that had been permanent, not to be obliterated by change of surroundings and the temptations of a trying occupation in a great city. That was the kind of conversion which the pastors of Bedford Street longed for as seals to their ministry.

AN HISTORIC CHURCH.

Last year, Bedford Street celebrated its jubilee with a week's services. Four bishops took part, several former pastors came and related their reminiscences and many old members travelled from other cities to bring golden-wedding gifts to the old church. It was a time of rejoicing for all. The visitors were delighted to find their old church home thriving and prosperous. The commodious parsonage, at 43 Morton Street, had been paid for and furnished, seven thousand dollars had been spent in improvements and not a dollar of debt encumbered the church. Nor was the spiritual aspect less cheering. The pastor, Rev. John J. Reed, D.D., was working in the spirit of his predecessors in every way in which the Spirit of Christ might lead him, and God was blessing his labors.

Dr. Reed, whose portrait is on first page, is still pastor of the time-honored church. He is an active, energetic, polished gentleman in the prime of life, an eloquent preacher and an indefatigable worker. He is widely known in connection with a remarkable movement which he initiated and which he calls "The Children's Hour." It is a very simple but very popular arrangement. Every Friday afternoon at half past three o'clock the children know that they will find Dr. Reed in the lecture-room. By bright, entertaining talks, object lessons and in other ways, Dr. Reed makes the time pass pleasantly for them, and the children go away pleased and instructed. It is not at all uncommon for five hundred children to be gathered together for "The Children's Hour." So successful has this institution been under Dr. Reed's management that many other pastors have introduced it in their churches and are reaping its fruits. Dr. Reed is a native of New York, was educated at the Polytechnic Institute, Brooklyn, and Wesleyan University, Middletown, Conn., and was for five years Professor of Latin and Greek in the Pennsylvania Military Academy at Chester, Pa. Westfield, N. J., was his first pastoral charge, and he held several other charges in the Newark Conference. In 1881, he was transferred to the New York Conference and became pastor of the Washington Square Church. Thence, at the earnest call of St. Paul's Church, Cincinnati, he went to that city where he labored successfully at St. Paul's and subsequently at the Walnut Hills Church. Several other churches in Western Conferences had urged their claims for a pastoral term, but Bedford Street, New York, was anxious to secure him, and Dr. Reed could not resist the call from the city of his boyhood days. The Walnut Hills Church bade him farewell at a magnificent entertainment on April 15, 1889, in the Scottish Rite Cathedral, which will not soon be forgotten in the Queen City. The assembly was a significant proof of the high esteem in which Dr. Reed was held by the whole community. A further tribute came from Ohio Wesleyan University, which conferred upon him the degree of D. D.

It is a very arduous work that Dr. Reed is prosecuting at Bedford Street in these days. During the past ten years there has been a remarkable change in the population of the district. Formerly it was known as the "American Ward" of New York, but of late the tendency to move up-town has changed all that. A large majority of the new comers are foreigners and Roman Catholics and now almost the whole district has been Romanized. Most of the Protestant Churches also have changed their location. Almost alone, Bedford Street now holds the fort for Protestantism in the district. Missionary work has to be done as a matter of duty and Dr. Reed pleads earnestly for helpers from other churches to aid him in this difficult work. Pastor and people are thoroughly in earnest and will gladly welcome any consecrated worker from the Methodist up-town churches who desires to serve the Master by giving time and labor to winning souls for Him in this populous field.

The anniversary services on Sunday next, November 22, to which reference has been made, will consist of an all-day prayer-meeting, with change of leaders every hour, from 9 a. m. to 10 p. m. Dr. C. H. Payne is expected to preach at 10:30 a. m., and Dr. J. O. Peck at 7:30 p. m. It promises to be a great day in the old church.

A MANUFACTURER'S PERSISTENCE.

ONE of New York's citizens quotes an amusing illustration of the persistence of advertising manufacturers. Many years ago he wanted some information about artificial limbs, so wrote for a circular to a manufacturer. The circular was instantly sent, and ever since the manufacturer has persistently followed him up. No matter how often he changes his address, every time the firm issues a circular descriptive of artificial limbs it always comes to hand. Being sound in limb, he has, of course, never bought any of the articles so eloquently described in the circular, but his name is down in the manufacturer's books, and in that one establishment he is held to be a crippled person. The mistake is obvious in his case, both to himself and those who know him, but if the firm was urging him to purchase a remedy for some insidious disease, the mistake might not be so obvious; as the man himself might have the disease without being aware of it. Then the firm's persistence in urging him to take a sure remedy might be well-timed and he would be wise in ascertaining if he had occasion for it. That is the case of some who are amused or annoyed by the persistence of ministers and Christian workers in urging them to seek salvation through Christ. Thinking they are whole they believe they have no need of a physician and they reject the only means of salvation. (Matt. 9: 12.)

A PATIENT'S SURPRISE.

A FEW days ago a man presented himself at Bellevue Hospital for treatment. He told the doctors he was suffering from rheumatism in his leg and it had been growing worse for three weeks past until he was not able to work. Asked what made him think it was rheumatism he said he had described the pain to a druggist, who without examining the limb told him it was rheumatism and sold him some liniment to rub it with. The Bellevue doctors made an examination and found that an abscess was forming in the leg. They concluded that it must arise from some foreign substance, so they put the patient under ether and cut into it. They found a bent pin over an inch long which the man must have swallowed at some time unconsciously and which must have worked its own way from the stomach into the limb. Had they accepted the former diagnosis and treated him for rheumatism the consequences to the patient might have been serious, yet the man himself had insisted that no operation was necessary and would not believe until the pin was shown to him. His case was like that of some whom Christ heals. Until the Holy Spirit enlightens them they imagine that the reformation of some evil habit or some slight improvement of life is all that is necessary to their spiritual health and cannot realize that the source of the evil is so deep-seated that only by receiving a new heart can they be made whole. (John 3: 5.)

A BOY HERO.

IN an old country-house near Clinton, N. Y., a few days ago a boy of fifteen and his sister eighteen years old, were eating their mid-day meal, their parents being away from home. The boy rose from the table and was about to go into the next room when he heard a crash. Looking around he saw the ceiling of the room fall in, and the whole mass of joists, boards, and the corn, which had been stored in the upper room, fall on and about the table at which he had been sitting a moment before. His sister was caught and pinned down to the floor by the boards and timbers, and but for the fact that she had been thrown near the stove she would have been instantly killed. The boy secured an axe and began the work of rescuing his sister. Cutting his way through the fallen flooring he found that her arm was held down by a joist. Then it was discovered that the stove had been broken and fire was starting in the debris lying on it. The girl saw the peril she was in, and begged her brother to chop her arm off with the axe and release her, but the boy only redoubled his exertions, and cut through the joist and liberated his sister. He dragged her out of the burning house and then set to work to put out the fire. When he was satisfied that the conflagration was extinguished, he ran for a doctor to his sister, who had fainted. She was badly cut and bruised but it is thought she will live. A work analogous to that the brave lad did for his sister needs to be done for a large part of humanity. Christ intended that his church should do it by relieving them of the weight of superstition, oppression and misery that was keeping them down and to rescue them from destruction. Christians who are concerned only for the well-being of their own souls, and whose religious life consists only in hearing sermons, reading good books, and regularly attending church, heedless of the suffering and misery around them, are recreant to their duty. (Matt. 25: 42-48.)

AN ELECTRICAL PROBLEM.

ELECTRICIANS are laboring earnestly to solve a problem which at present seems insoluble. A fortune awaits the man who can find out how to renew the delicate little loop of carbon within the pear-shaped incandescent electric lamps. Millions of these lamps are now turned out every year, and after burning for about six hundred hours each, they are useless. The glass and the two minute threads of platinum, which convey the current to the arc of carbon, are as good as when the lamp left the factory, but the arc is broken or burnt through and there is no light in the lamp. The majority remain in working order until the failure of the carbon loop, which is the soul of the lamp. Its frail tenure of life depends on the outer air being excluded. When first inserted in the glass bulb there is an aperture in the lower part of the bulb, from which the air is exhausted and the aperture is then sealed by the bead or point of glass seen on every lamp. The vacuum in the bulb, however, is never absolutely perfect and it is the rarified particles of air remaining, which cause the carbon to slowly burn through. When that happens, the lamp is useless, for no way has yet been found of renewing the carbon, and afterward exhausting the air. An analogous problem in human nature has exercised the minds of philosophers in all ages. If selfishness, and other propensities to evil could be eliminated from man's nature the light of the soul would shine clear and bright, but no human power can do that, and there is, therefore, darkness where there should be light. But what the philosophers have failed to do God does, by giving a new heart and renewing a right spirit within the man. (Ps. 51: 10.)

NONDESCRIPT FLAGS.

AN order has been issued by the Secretary of War to correct a practice which he deems a military abuse. There are institutions in many States where military instruction is given to the students by an officer detailed for the purpose by the Federal Government. Arms, ammunition, and equipments are also provided by the Government. In several instances the secretary has learned that it is the custom, on occasions for the hoisting of a flag to run up the flag of the State or even a flag peculiar to the institution. The Secretary holds that the acceptance by a State institution of arms and ammunition and the detail of an officer for the purpose of military instruction, establishes the national character of that institution. Hence he considers that the National Government has the right to require that its flags shall be used wherever its equipments are used. It is understood to be the purpose of the War Department to withdraw all support and details of officers from institutions refusing to comply. The principle underlying Mr. Proctor's order is just, and it applies to churches as well as military colleges. Some of the denominations are more anxious to insist on their denominational peculiarities than they are to proclaim their fealty to the Great Head of the Church. (1 Cor. 1: 10-13.)

SUNSET ON GALILEE.

WAS sun-set! and the waters,
All aglow with mellow light,
Looked so quiet, calm and restful,
As day gave way to night,
That the lonely, silent watcher
Kneeling on the cold damp earth,
Lifts His eyes in speechless longing
To the home which gave Him birth.

See! the arms are outstretched now,
And His eyes are dim with tears,
As the trembling lips call: "Father,
Help Thy Son to quell their fears!
May their faith grow brighter, clearer,
As each trial o'er them rolls,
Draw them ever nearer, nearer,
Only purify their souls!"

Do'st thou know this Man of Sorrows
With the eyes of heavenly hue?
Can'st thou give up all and follow
When and where He leadeth you?
Oh! for faith! the faith of Jesus,
As He knelt by Galilee;
As the winds and sea obey Thee,
Christ, my Saviour, make thou me!

GOOD ASSOCIATIONS.

LET no young man or woman go in a social circle where the influences are vicious or hostile to the Christian religion. You will begin by reproofing their faults, and end by copying them. Sin is contagious. You go among those who are profane, and you will be profane. You go among those who use impure language, and you will use impure language. Go among those who are given to strong drink, and you will inevitably become an inebriate. There is no exception to the rule. A man is no better than the company he continually keeps. It is always best to keep ourselves under Christian influences. It is not possible, if you mingle in associations that are positively Christian, not to be made better men or women. The Christian people with whom you associate may not be always talking their religion, but there is something in the moral atmosphere that will be life to your soul. You choose out for your most intimate associates eight or ten Christian people. You mingle in that association; you take their counsel; you are guided by their example, and you live a useful life, and die a happy death, and go to a blessed eternity. There is no possibility of mistaking; there is not an exception in all the universe or ages—not one.

FRIGID CHURCHES.

HOW often it is that the old church of the village has a large congregation and a good minister. Neither pastor nor people have ever been excited about anything save once, when a resident of the city moved into the village and tried to distract the church by suggesting a young people's prayer-meeting; but the officials formed themselves into a line, as at a fire, and passed buckets of cold water till the danger was put out.

About the last item of fresh news they seemed to have heard was that Moses slew an Egyptian, but they said not much about that for the reason that they did not want to commit themselves, or spoke of it in such a guarded way that if they wanted to change sides on the question they could do so without sacrificing their manliness. The last church that Rip Van Winkle attended before getting drowsy was that. On the day he left they were asleep, and when he woke up they were asleep yet. The dominie has not prepared a new sermon for ten years. The paper is very yellow—a color he prefers, since it looks like the parchment on which the Scriptures were originally written. The same Thanksgiving discourse does for every year with this slight change: He has two slips of paper, one marked A, the other B. If it has been a prosperous year, then on Thanksgiving day he uses the slip marked A; but if the corn and potatoes have been poor, he uses the slip B. Everything in that church is comfortable, fat and easy. But a few good men, wanting a little more life, build a second church and call a devoted minister. Their means are small and the times hard. The old minister does not like the new one, and takes every opportunity of keeping him humble. Old minister goes around one afternoon to hear young minister, who is, of course, embarrassed, and does not do as well as usual, and nearly breaks down in the sermon. Old minister looks mortified, puts his head down on the pew in front to hide his embarrassment, and goes home wondering how any people can stand such preaching. The second church finally goes down. It had been under a broadside fire ever since the day it was dedicated. There was room for two—yea for four—religious societies, but first church did not think so. Oftimes was the experiment tried again, but no sooner did a Methodist or a Baptist, or Episcopal head lift above the water than there came from the old-established meeting-house of the place a volley of anathemas. Such things are occurring in many places. Oh, let us give everybody a chance!

POST MORTEM ABUSE.

I HAVE read all that has recently been recently written about Abraham Lincoln as a spiritualist, and I do not believe a word of it. This is the only kind of slander that is safe. The protracted discussion has made only one impression on me, and that is this: How safe it is to slander a dead man! You may say what you will in print about him, he brings no rebutting evidence. I have heard that ghosts do a great many things, but I have never heard of one as printing a book or editing a newspaper to vindicate himself. Look out how you vilify a living man, for he may respond with pen, or tongue, or cowhide; but only get a man thoroughly dead (that is, so certified by the coroner) and have a good, heavy tombstone put on the top of him, and then you may say what you will with impunity. But I have read somewhere in an old book that there is a day coming when all wrongs will be righted; and I should not wonder if then the dead were vindicated, and all the swine who have uprooted graveyards should, like their ancestors of Gadara, run down a steep place into the sea and get choked. The fact that there are now alive men so debauched of mind and soul that they rejoice in mauling the reputation of those who spent their lives in illustrious achievement for God and their country, and then died as martyrs for their principles, makes me believe in eternal damnation.

PULPIT PRAYER.

LET not the prayer of him that conducts public service go up solitary and alone, but accompanied by the heartfelt ejaculation of all the auditory. We sit down on a soft cushion, in a pew by architectural skill arranged to fit the shape of our back, and are tempted to fall into unprofitable reveries. Let the effort be on the part of every minister to make the prayer and the Scripture reading and the giving out of the hymn so emphatic that the audience cannot help but respond with all the soul.

Let the minister, before going into the pulpit, look over the whole field and recall what are the styles of bereavement in the congregation—whether they be widowhood, orphanage or childlessness;

what are the kinds of temporal loss his people may recently have suffered—whether in health, in reputation, or in estate; and then get both his shoulders under these troubles, and in his prayer give one earnest and tremendous lift, and there will be no dullness, no indifference, no lack of multitudinous response.

The reason that congregations have their heads bobbing about in prayer-time is because the officiating clergyman is apt to petition in the abstract. He who calls the troubles of his people by their right names, and tenderly lays hold of the cancers of the souls before him, will not lack in getting immediate heartfelt, if not audible, response.

STIR THEM UP.

THERE has somehow got abroad an impression among our young ministers, that the people will not take the unadulterated Gospel. It is thought that instead of the theory that men are corrupt and unsavable, save through Christ, we must flatter them with the idea that there is good enough in them, if it could only be brought out—we must flatter them, and tell them what fine fellows they are, and that if they have a little fixing-up they will be all right. Hence, religion is often presented as a weak sentimentality rather than an infinite necessity. To please the fastidious taste of the day, we must make our sermon a sort of cream meringue, light and frothy, and sweet, and almost vanishing at the touch of a spoon. O vast mistake! The people are hungry for a stout gospel with bones in it. The greatest novelty for an audience now is Repentance and Faith. The people are ready to hear, if we are not too great cowards to speak it. Do not let us be patting them on the backs when we ought to be rousing their souls.

GOOD FOOD.

THE world wonders that, with such a rousing theme as the Gospel, and with such a grand work as saving souls, the ministry should ever be nerveless. Some ascribe it to lack of piety, and some to timidity of temperament. We believe that in a great number of cases it is from the lack of nourishing food. Many of the clerical brotherhood are on low diet. After jackets and sacks have been provided for the eight or ten children of the parsonage, the father and mother must watch the table with the severest economy. Coming in suddenly upon the dinner-hour of the country clergyman, the housewife apologizes for what she calls "a picked-up" dinner, when, alas! it is nearly always picked up. Congregations sometimes mourn over dull preaching when themselves are to blame. Give your minister more food and he will have more fire. Next to the divine unction, the minister needs blood; and he cannot make that out of tough leather. One reason why the apostles preached so powerfully was that they had healthy food. Fish was cheap along Galilee, and this, with unbolted bread, gave them plenty of phosphorus for brain-food. These early ministers were never invited out to late suppers, with chicken salad and doughnuts. Nobody ever embroidered slippers for the big foot of Simon Peter, the fisherman preacher. Tea-parties, with hot waffles, at ten o'clock at night, make namby-pamby ministers; but good hours and substantial diet, that furnishes nitrates for the muscle, and phosphates for the brain, and carbonates for the whole frame prepare a man for effective work. When the water is low, the mill-wheel goes slow; but a full race, and how fast the grists are ground! In a man the arteries are the mill-race and the brain the wheel, and the practical work of life is the grist ground. The reason soldiers fail in some of the battles was because their stomachs had for several days been innocent of everything but "hard-tack." See that your minister has a full haversack. Feed him on gruel during the week and on Sunday he will give you gruel. What is called the "parson's nose" in a turkey or fowl is an allegory setting forth that in many communities the minister comes out behind.

BRIEF NOTES.

The secretary of the Skin and Cancer Hospital at Fordham, N. Y., asks us to acknowledge the receipt of $10.50 from "Humble Servant" who read the account of the hospital in this journal and desired to help the work.

The Chinese Government have paid to the Rev. Thomas Branfill, acting chairman of the Wuchang district, £3,000 for the widowed mother of the late Mr. Argent, the missionary, who was killed a short time ago by rioters.

Special services for young men were held at the Eighty-sixth St. Branch of the Y.M.C.A., New York, during the week of prayer November 8-14. Dr. Abbot E. Kittredge, Dr. E. Walpole Warren and other clergymen conducted the services.

The American Evangelization Society has been organized with offices at 11 and 13 Thomas Street, New York, to send forth consecrated men to preach Christ in any church or mission regardless of sect or creed. The secretary is Mr. S. J. Betts, 117 Newman Avenue, Bayonne, N. J. Churches in need of an Evangelist for special work may find the man they need by communicating with Mr. Betts.

The Vanderbilt Mission, New York, a picture of which appeared in this journal on June 10, was used for public service for the first time on Nov. 1. The building is not yet quite finished, so the formal dedication has not yet taken place. The Rev. G. P. Cartensen who will have charge of the Mission, was anxious to commence its work as soon as possible so has not waited for the completion of the edifice.

The New York Sunday School Association held the first of its Winter's meetings on November 9, in the Collegiate Reformed Church, 29th Street and Fifth Avenue. Mr. Ralph Wells presided and Dr. William T. Sabine and Dr. David James Burrell delivered addresses. The Association now holds weekly meetings for teachers in various churches for the study of the next Sunday's international lesson. Mr. Ralph Wells, Dr. Schaffler and other eminent gentlemen conduct them.

A meeting to give moral support to the citizens of Louisiana who are struggling to rid themselves of the Louisiana Lottery was held in New York on November 12. Among the eminent clergymen who signed the call for the meeting were Bishop H. C. Potter, Dr. George Alexander, Dr. Charles F. Deems, Dr. Edward Judson, Dr. Lyman Abbott and Dr. C. H. Parkhurst. The brave Christian men who are laboring amid many discouragements to save their state from reproach, will be glad to learn how heartily the Christians of all denominations in New York wish them success in their efforts.

The first "Edition" of the People's Palace in connection with the Tabernacle at the corner of York and Henderson Streets, Jersey City, N. J., was opened on November 9. Dr. Lyman Abbott, Dr. W. S. Rainsford, Dr. A. H. Bradford and other ministers interested in philanthropic Christian work attended and made addresses. Dr. John L. Scudder, the pastor of the Tabernacle, has done wonderful work among the poor, which has been fully described in this journal. He is now endeavoring to raise funds for the completion of the edifice which will be a great benefit to the poor of the city.

Contributions to the fund for supplying colored ministers in the South with this journal have been received since our last acknowledgment to the amount of $59.50. They are from: "Ayr" $10; "Friend" $10; Paterson, N. J., $1; Marple, Pa., $1; Franklinville, N. Y., $1; Tyler, Wash., $3; "Friend" $3; Dutchess Junction, N. Y., $3.50; "Stranger" $3.50; East Shelburne, Mass., $5; Martin, Mich., $8.50; Olmitz, Kans., $10. These amounts, for which in behalf of the beneficiaries, we thank our friends, enable us to comply with the request of many of these hard-working ministers who urgently need just the help this journal is adapted to supply. When a contribution to this fund is received, the publisher of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD places on the mailing list for a year as many names of colored ministers from the list of those applying for the paper as there are dollars in the contribution. Each contributor (except anonymous ones) receives by mail the name and address of the minister or ministers who benefit by his contribution and each minister is informed of the name and address of the person to whom he is indebted for the paper.

RECORD OF THE WEEK.

Chilian Troubles.—Chicago Anarchists Arrested.—Our New Silver Coinage.—An English Palace Burned.—The Quebec Scandal.—Brazil Under a Dictator.—General Notes.

WITH the choice of Admiral Jorge Montt as President of Chili, the prospect of an early settlement of our misunderstanding with that government is greatly improved. President Montt and his brother Senor Montt, the Chilian Minister at Washington, are both warm friends of this country. At the same time, there is still a very strong feeling in Santiago against Minister Egan and it has been charged anew that he is sheltering enemies of the government in the American Legation. These stories have been repudiated by the government at Santiago, some of them being of a character calculated to excite a rising against the Legation. One of the sensational fabrications alleged that a plan had been concocted among the refugees in the Legation for the assassination of Gen. Canto, Commander-in-Chief of the Chilian army. Meanwhile all our navy yards are busy getting the war vessels ready and the construction and repair departments in the yards have not seen so much activity since the days of the Civil War. One serious defect, in the event of naval war just now, would be our lack of torpedoes in outfitting our warships. Chili is said to be plentifully supplied with these. It is believed that President Harrison will back up our next demand upon Chili with a formidable display of naval strength followed by an ultimatum if necessary. On the twelfth instant, the resignation of the Chilian cabinet was announced, this step being due to the fact that the Liberal deputies failed to elect Councillors of State, in accordance with an agreement previously made with the ministers. A mixed cabinet was then organized to carry out a non-political programme, President Montt having stipulated that his administration was not to be bound politically.

Brazil Under a Dictator.

WHEN Manuel Deodora da Fonseca, one of the ablest of Brazil's military leaders, was called to the Presidency immediately after the dethronement of Dom Pedro, he was the unanimous choice of the country and his administration till very lately progressed smoothly and satisfactorily. But, like all other South American nations, the Brazilians are divided into many factions representing bitter political enmities and jealousies. For a time

Fonseca succeeded in harmonizing these discordant elements. Recently a breach occurred between Congress and the President on the question of an expansion of the currency, the President and Cabinet favoring inflation and Congress opposing it. The latter not only killed the inflation bill but passed an impeaching bill over the Presidential veto, whereupon Fonseca, disregarding the Constitution, declared the Congress dissolved, although the budget was as yet untouched. The press was muzzled, martial law was declared in the capital, and a military tribunal was established. Attempted disturbances were promptly suppressed. A revolt against Fonseca's distasteful dictatorship broke out in Rio Grande do Sul, one of the southern provinces, and a band of insurgents captured the town of Santa Anna. It was reported that several garrisons had gone over to the insurgents, and even that government troops had deserted Fonseca and fraternized with the rebels. Street riots occurred in Rio Janeiro, caused by a disturbance in a theatre, where a number of students who hissed were turned out by the police, and a street fight followed. Appearances indicate that neither the army nor the navy will be entirely loyal to Fonseca, and very serious trouble is expected in the near future. New elections have been called in Brazil and the difficulties may possibly be settled by the choice of a Congress agreeable to Fonseca's plans. The followers of Dom Pedro, the exiled Emperor, have actively fomented the troubles, and but for Fonseca's prompt assumption of dictatorial powers, might have succeeded in overturning the Republic, and opening the way for a monarchical restoration. A portrait of President Fonseca is given in this column.

Major McKinley's Election.

Now that the election is a thing of the past, it becomes clearer that the one prominent feature of the campaign was Ohio. Contrasted with a majority of the states where no national issues were at stake, the election of Major William McKinley, the father of the protective tariff, furnished evidence that the tariff is still a vital question which may reasonably be expected to command a large share of attention in the approaching Presidential struggle. In a recent address, Major McKinley stated his belief that the judgment of most Americans did not approve the constant agitation of the tariff issue, in view of the fact that nothing in the line of effective legislation can at present be accomplished. A similar opinion has been expressed on different occasions by leading Democrats; yet the present prospect points to tariff and currency as the overshadowing issues next year. A portrait of Major McKinley (whose career has already been sketched in these columns), appears on this page.

England Swept by Great Gales.

FURIOUS gales, doing an immense amount of damage by land and sea, have been experienced in Great Britain and along the western coasts. A large number of vessels and hundreds of lives have been lost. The iron ship Benvenue, bound from London for Sidney, was wrecked in the English Channel and several of her crew perished. Even ocean steamers were compelled to seek shelter and the quartermaster of the White Star steamer Britannic, was swept overboard and drowned. The steamer Hawarden Castle was wrecked at the mouth of the river Mersey and her crew perished. In the coast cities of France and Spain and along the North Sea the damage was widespread, houses being unroofed and life-saving stations demolished.

Our New Coins.

WITH the beginning of 1892, the National Mint will issue a new silver coinage of dimes, quarters and half-dollars, the designs for which have already been approved and the models made by Charles E. Barber, the engraver at the Philadelphia Mint. The design of the new half-dollar is shown in the illustration. In selecting the head of the Goddess of Liberty for the obverse, one closely resembling the figure used on the coins of the French Republic has been adopted, being slightly different in its lines from that on any of the other coins now used here. Liberty is represented looking to the right, with a dignified and almost severe expression, and wearing a Phrygian cap. In the band or fillet over the front of the head is inscribed the word: "Liberty," and at the top of the coin is the motto: "In God we Trust." Around the edge are thirteen stars, representing the thirteen original states, and at the bottom is the date. The reverse shows the eagle with the national motto e pluribus unum and the usual inscription. The new quarter dollar and dime will have the same head on the obverse as the half-dollar.

An English Palace Burned.

SANDRINGHAM HALL, the Prince of Wales' residence in Yorkshire, was partially destroyed by fire recently, during the absence of the Prince and his family in London. The fire broke out in the upper story and was only extinguished after eight hours' work by the firemen. While the upper stories were more or less wrecked and the lower rooms damaged by water, the art gallery was hardly injured. On the ground floor were some famous objects of art, and many of the treasures brought from India and other distant countries by the Prince, and these escaped undamaged. The loss is estimated at $100,000. A picture of Sandringham Hall is given in this column.

Chicago Anarchists Arrested.

FOR sometime past, the Anarchists have threatened another outbreak in Chicago, and the police have been specially watchful of Grief's Hall, a noted Anarchist resort, said to be the place where the fatal Haymarket Riot was plotted. A few evenings ago, the Anarchists met to commemorate the death of Spies and Parsons, two of the leaders who were executed several years ago. The interior of the hall was draped in red flags and speeches of a violent and incendiary character were being delivered, when a strong detachment of police broke in and dispersed the meeting, arresting twenty-five Anarchists, some of the latter armed with pistols and other weapons. During the struggle accompanying the arrest, the drapery was torn down and the entire front of the wooden building damaged. The police claim to be in possession of startling information, pointing to another plot as desperate as that of the Haymarket affair. A number of guns were seized and taken to the Central Office. The Anarchists threatened that within a short time Chicago would be shaken as it has not been since the famous outrage of 1886. It is claimed by the parties arrested that the meeting was not of an Anarchist character but was a peaceable assembly of workingmen, but this is denied by the authorities.

The Quebec Municipal Frauds.

GRADUALLY the facts connected with the Quebec Public Works scandal are coming out and our Canadian neighbors are naturally shocked at the revelation of so much corruption in official circles. Minister Chapleau has already resigned his seat in the Dominion Cabinet on account of the disclosures, and Premier Mercier of Quebec is now engaged in a bitter controversy with the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province, for the same reason. A leading factor in the present trouble is Ernest Pacaud, whose portrait is given in this column. Some years ago, the Baie de Chaleur Railway was granted a charter by the Quebec government. Ex-Governor Robitaille, L. S. Riopel and others were interested. The company failed to meet its obligations to the contractors and its charter was revoked. Then a syndicate was formed, known as the Cooper-Thom Syndicate, which assumed all the old company's debts and secured a subsidy of 800,000 acres from the government, the land being valued at 55 cents per acre. Mr. Armstrong, a contractor, held a claim against the old company for nearly $300,000 and offered to take $175,000 if paid immediately. Being eager to settle, he employed Pacaud, who is owner of the government newspaper organ, L'Electeur, to negotiate the matter, the latter being promised $100,000 for his services. Acting-Premier Garneau issued Provincial letters of credit for $175,000 on the subsidy account, but the banks demanded that the letters be endorsed by wealthy citizens before accepting them. One man, P. Valliere, endorsed, and received as his reward a contract for $200,000 for furnishing the Montreal Court-House, which he afterward sublet for $75,000. Pacaud was paid for his share of the work in five checks. It was alleged that $5,000 of this corruption money was used for a draft for 25,000 francs, which was sent to the Premier, then in Paris. When this leaked out, Governor Angers instantly gave Mercier the alternative of a royal commission of investigation or dismissal from office. This is the present status of the scandal which has shaken the Dominion to its political centre.

NEWS NOTES.

The labor candidates in the English municipal elections have carried thirty seats.

Grand Duke George, son of the Czar, is dying of consumption at Livadia, in the Crimea.

Plots to overthrow the government of Portugal are giving the monarchy great uneasiness.

A disease, known as Asiatic black tongue, has broken out at Sheridan, Ind., and several deaths have occurred.

The Naval Court of Inquiry has exonerated Commander Cowles from responsibility for the wreck of the U. S. C. S. Despatch.

Six men were killed and seven injured by an explosion in No. 1 shaft of the Susquehanna Coal Mine at Nanticoke, last week.

Gen. E. Burd Grubb, U. S. Minister to Spain, was married in London a few days ago, to Miss Violet Sopwith, a wealthy Scotch lady.

Hiram Lester, aged 124, and Mrs. Mary E. Mosely, aged 80, were married at Atlanta, Ga., lately. The groom claims to be the oldest man in the world.

The proceedings in the Itala case have been abandoned, the United States Circuit Court holding that the steamer committed no violation of our neutrality laws.

The Cork election passed off very quietly. John E. Redmond, who aspired to succeed Parnell, was defeated, and Martin Flavin, a merchant of Cork, elected.

Timothy Healy, an Irish M. P., was horse-whipped by Mr. McDermott, a nephew of Parnell, for speaking disrespectfully of Mrs. Parnell, during a speech he made at Longford.

The government is preparing to strengthen our Pacific Coast defenses against possible attacks. It is considered not improbable that Chili, in the event of war, might attack in that quarter.

The condition of Sir William Vernon Harcourt's eyesight is such that his retirement from politics seems certain. He will never be able to assume the Liberal leadership as Mr. Gladstone's successor.

Seventeen miners were dashed to death in the Anaconda Mine near Butte, Mont., a few nights ago. They were descending in a cage when the rope gave way, and they were hurled lifeless to the bottom.

Archduke Johann, of Austria, who, over a year ago, gave up his title and position at court, and with his wife set sail for South America on a vessel of which he was captain, has been heard from. The ship was wrecked off the coast of Chili, and the archduke, who took the name of Johann Orth, took service in the Chilian army and fought during the late rebellion.

Governor Buchanan, of Tennessee, has determined to send back the released convicts to the mines, and a guerilla warfare in the Coal Creek district is expected as the free miners are equally resolved to prevent their return. Nearly one-half the prisoners liberated by the miners have surrendered to the authorities, being tired of hiding in the mountains and hunted like wild beasts. Many, however, have escaped into Kentucky and may never be caught, and returned to prison.

During his journey through Germany, the Czar was the special object of Emperor William's solicitude. The greatest precaution was observed lest harm befall his Russian Majesty while on German territory. In vain the Kaiser tried to have a meeting with Alexander. The latter sent word by an attache that "he had decided to follow a pacific policy and any interview he might have with William could not change his opinion." This was done to put in question the pacific intentions of the Emperor himself.

EYES OPENED.

"And God opened her eyes."—Genesis 21: 19.

THERE was a well of water close to Hagar all the while though she saw it not. God did not cleave the earth and cause new waters to gush forth, nor was there need. The well was there already, but for all practical purposes it might not have been there, for she could not see it. The water was spent in her bottle, her child was dying with thirst, and she herself was ready to faint, and yet the cool spring was bubbling up hard by the spot. It was needful that she should see the well, quite as needful as that the well should be there, and therefore the Lord in great compassion led her to see it, or as the text puts it, "God opened her eyes."

This is a small matter compared with the creation of a new fountain, but our God does very little things as well as very great things.

When There is Need

for them. The same God who divides the Red Sea, and makes the Jordan to be dried up, opens a poor woman's eyes. The same God who came with all his chariots of fire to Paran, and with all his holy ones to Sinai, and made the mountain utterly to smoke in his presence, is he of whom we read, "and God opened Hagar's eyes." The infinite Lord is at home in doing little things; he counts the stars but he also numbers the hairs of our heads.

There may be persons present who want but very little to enable them to enter into eternal life: they need only that their eyes should be opened. May the Lord grant them that favor! Oh that he may now bid many a Hagar see his salvation! Why should the thirsty souls wait any longer? Everything is ready: they are on the borders of salvation, but they need that their eyes should be opened. Our subject at this time shall be the opening of eyes, taking rather a wide range, because it is a wide subject.

I. Our first head shall be that if our eyes were further opened to any one among us would be very remarkable. We are at present limited in our range of sight. This is true of our natural and physical vision, and of our spiritual vision; and in each case when the range of sight is enlarged very remarkable discoveries are made. God has been pleased to open the natural eyes of mankind by the invention of optical instruments. What a discovery it was when first of all certain pieces of glass were arranged in connection with each other, and men began to peer among the stars! What a change has come over the knowledge of our race by the invention of the telescope! How much of truly devout, adoring thought, and of deep, intense, unutterable reverence has been born into the world by the Lord's having in this sense opened men's eyes!

Equally marvellous was the effect upon human knowledge when the microscope was invented. We could never have imagined what wonders of skill and of taste would be revealed by the magnifying glass, and what marvels of beauty would be found compressed within a space too small to measure. Who dreamed that a butterfly's wing would display art and wisdom, and a delicacy never to be rivalled by human workmanship. The most delicate work of art is rough, crude, raw compared with the commonest object in nature; the one is the production of man, the other the handiwork of God. Spend an evening and if your heart be right, you will lift your eye away from the glass to heaven, and exclaim, "Great God, thou art as wonderful in the little as thou art in the great, and as much to be praised for the minute as for the magnificent." Our physical eyes thus opened by either glass reveal great marvels, and we may infer from this fact that the opening of our mental and physical eyes will discover to us equal wonders in other domains, and thus increase our reverence and love towards God.

Suppose, dear brethren, that our eyes could be opened to all our past lives. We have seen them, for we have travelled through them; but it was very cloudy when I went that way; I do not know how it was with you. None of us have our eyes thoroughly opened yet; we have hitherto been travelling through life as men who journey in a mist. Even the things which have come close to us, and have most affected us, have been hidden, as it were, in that which is not light, but darkness visible. And now if we could look back upon the whole length of our life, forty, or fifty or sixty, or seventy years, with our eyes opened, how singular it would look! Our childhood—how different that period would now appear with

God's Light Upon it.

Those struggles for a livelihood; we thought them hard, but we already begin to see what discipline there was in them, and how necessary they were for us. Those losses and crosses—why even with our present partial sight we can see how much they were for our good. Yet there remain in life some singular things which we cannot as yet explain. Why was the favorite son taken away just when all our hopes were to have been fulfilled in him? Why was the husband struck down when the little children were so dependent? Why was the wife removed when a mother's care was most needed? Why fell that daughter sick so suddenly? Why were we ourselves baulked in the moment of success? If our eyes could be opened so that we could see what would have been if things had gone differently we should all of us thank God that our lives were ordered as they have been.

A Father's Dream.

Have you never heard of one who was grievously lamenting the death of his favorite son, and falling asleep dreamed that he saw his boy alive again and that he beheld the life which that son would have led. It was such a life that he wept in his dream, and waking he blessed God that his son could never act according to what he had seen in the vision. It was better that he should be dead. Repine no more, my sorrowing friend, for that which you would have kept in your bosom might have turned into a viper, that which you thought a treasure might have burned in your heart like coals of fire. Providence has ordered all things wisely, and if our eyes were opened we should bow in adoring reverence and magnify the God who hath done all things well. Our vision will be strengthened one day, so that we shall see the end from the beginning, and then we shall understand that the Lord maketh all things work together for good to them that love him.

And now suppose, again, our eyes should be opened on the future. Ay, would you not like to spy into destiny? My curiosity is, probably, as great as yours, but still it is balanced by another faculty, and I protest that if I could see into to-morrow I would

Refuse to Look.

There is a desire in man to know what lines have been written for him in the book of fate—whether they shall be bright or dark. Ah, dear friend, if your eyes could be opened as to all that is to happen, what would you do? If you were wise, and knew your future, you would commit it unto God; commit it to him though you do not know it. If you were wise you would wish to spend that future in his service if you knew it: spend it in his service though it is hidden from you. If you knew what would happen you would feel great need for faith; you do not know what will happen, but your need of faith is precisely the same. Trust you in God, come what may.

And what, once more, if your eyes could be opened to ### Look into Heaven?

Where it is we do not know. It is not very far away. At any rate the glorified know what we do here, for they rejoice over one sinner that repents. Evidently, too, it takes not long to travel thither, for it was eventide when Jesus told the thief that he should be with him in paradise that very day, and you may be sure he was there. Oh, that we could see the place of unveiled glory and unmingled bliss as we shall see it in an instant when our Father's messenger, called death, shall strike the scales from our eyes, or rather, remove these dim optics with which we blunderingly see, and let our naked spirit gaze on the reality of things without these hindering eyes, which do but inform us of their outward show. Oh, what glories shall we then see! What splendor, above the light of the sun! What music, sweeter than harpers harping with their harps! What glory! Solomon knew not the like of this.

II. In some things

Our Eyes must be Opened.

Those I have spoken about are desirable in a measure, but these are absolutely necessary. For instance, as to the divine salvation, our eyes must be opened. Hagar's case was a strange one. Picture it. She is thirsty, and her boy is dying: her instincts are quickened by her love to her child, and yet she cannot see a well of water. There it is! Close to her! Do you not see it? Just there. She cannot see it till her eyes are opened. It is as plain as a pikestaff, but she does not perceive it. Now, this is a graphic representation of the position of many a seeking sinner. There is the way of salvation, and if there is anything plain in the world, it is that road of life. The fact that twice two make four is not plainer than—believe in the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved. Look unto the Son of God and live: what can be more simple? And yet nobody did understand the doctrine of "believe and live" till God opened his eyes. The well is there, but the thirsty soul cannot see it. Christ is there, but

The Sinner Cannot See

him. There is a fountain filled with blood, but he does not know how to wash in it. There stand the words, "Believe and live," simple words that need no explanation, legible by their own light, and so plain that a wayfaring man, though a fool, may comprehend them; yet, till the eternal light flashes upon the darkened eyeballs of the sinner, he cannot, and will not perceive the self-evident truth.

Whence this inability to see? I suppose Hagar's eye was somewhat darkened by her grief. She was broken-hearted, poor woman, and therefore her eye was not so clear as usual. So some souls have such grief for sin, such sorrow for having offended God, such fear of wrath to come, that they cannot perceive the truth which would comfort them. What aileth thee, poor soul? What aileth thee? It is well that thou dost grieve for sin, but Christ has come to put it away. It is well that thou dost mourn thy lost estate, but Christ has come to save thee, and there he is right before thee if thou canst but see him.

It was unbelief, too, that darkened Hagar's eyes. God had appeared to her years before, you remember, when she was in very much the same plight, and he had then given her a promise that he would make of her son that was to be born a great nation. She might have reflected that this could never happen unless the boy's life was preserved, and since he could not live without a drink of water, she should have felt confident that water would be forthcoming. She was unbelieving, but it is not ours to judge her; for, alas,

We are Unbelieving, Too.

Anxious soul, is that thy case? Oh, if thou couldst believe! Truly, thou hast good cause. It should not be hard to believe what God says, for he cannot lie; but, still, unbelief darkens many an eye.

There are many who cannot see because of self-conceit. When great self feasts his eye upon his own good works or religious performances, of course he cannot see the way of salvation by Christ alone. The Lord take these scales from thy eyes, poor sinner, for self is a great maker of darkness. I use very homely metaphors. I have sometimes even employed what the more refined call vulgar expressions: I would be more vulgar still, if I could thereby help a soul to see Christ. I tell you Jesus is near to you, and within your reach, and that salvation is close at your foot. You have but to trust in the Lord Jesus Christ, and you shall be saved. But I know that, after all is said and done, if you ever see Christ it will be because the Holy Spirit opens your eyes. I cannot open them, nor any other mortal man; for since the world began it hath not been known that any man has opened the eyes of one that was born blind. Oh, that the Lord would be pleased now to open the eye of every sinner here to see salvation in the atoning blood of Jesus Christ, the Son of God.

III. I must leave that point, and finish with one more. In our present case it is that our eyes should be opened. To many it is imperatively needful at this very moment, for if not now recovered from their blindness they will die in their sins. In this great throng there are some to whom it is pre-eminently desirable that their eyes should be opened at once to see what the inevitable result of their present mode of life will be, for their blindness is the source of great peril to them. That young gentleman who is spending his money upon the racecourse and loose society, I should think he might see with half an eye what will come of his conduct. The devil never runs express trains to hell: there is no need for it, for you can go there fast enough by race-horses. The turf has furnished to many an express method of ruining their fortunes and their souls. Get into that line of things, and all it means, and all the society that goes with it, and your future needs no prophet. Many young men do not think till it is too late to think. I wish I could put a cool hand upon that hot brow and stop that young man and make him stand still and consider, O that the Lord would open his eyes.

On the Verge.

And that young woman who has begun to look (not much, as yet) on what is called gaiety. Ah, the Lord stay thee, my sister, and open thy eyes ere thou goest one step farther, for one step farther may be thy ruin. And that tradesman who has begun—no, he has not quite begun as yet,—but he is thinking about a course of trade which will land him in something more shameful than bankruptcy, I pray the Lord to open his

Is the War Foreshadowed by Journalists the one Predicted by Daniel?

SINCE M. de Blowitz, the famous correspondent of the London Times issued his warning to Europe that a general war would probably come from the gathering of the great Powers into two camps—Germany, Austria and Italy in Triple Alliance on the one side and Russia and France allied on the other—all the world has been watching the progress of international events with keen interest. No observers have been more intent than have been students of prophecy, who saw in the outline of the probable future, which the experienced journalist so graphically sketched, a situation resembling that described by the prophets as the one which would be evolved before the second advent of our Lord. Their studies have led them to expect a re-arrangement of the map of Europe in which the kingdoms surrounding the Mediterranean Sea and covering the territory of Cæsar's Roman Empire will number only ten, corresponding to the ten toes of the image, described in Daniel's second chapter. This rearrangement could scarcely be made without war and it will be very likely to come from such a war as M. de Blowitz foresees. When that territory is resolved into ten kingdoms, prophetic students will know that the end is very near.

Recent events tend to confirm M. de Blowitz's statements. He assured us that in spite of the fraternization of royalties there was no real cordiality between them. That underneath the compliments and fraternal greetings of the Sovereigns there was distrust and though monarchs and statesmen were talking of peace, they were in their hearts expecting war. He believed that no long time would elapse before even the appearance of friendship would be cast off and the slights and affronts which precede an open rupture would be witnessed. Confirmation of this prediction appeared on Nov. 4, in the New York Herald in a cable despatch from M. St. Cere, one of its correspondents in Europe, who, says the Herald in an editorial, "points out a dark spot on the horizon—the Czar has again passed through Germany without stopping, thereby a second time within three months offering an unmistakable snub to the Emperor William. M. St. Cere does not go so far as to say that war is near, but is convinced that all reconciliation between Romanoff and Hohenzollern is impossible, and this is a fact with which the political world will have to count." The significance of the Czar's act is more marked in view of the fact that the Emperor of Germany has twice visited the Czar in St. Petersburg while the Czar passes through Germany without a greeting. That the Emperor understood the slight, was evident from his remark that though the Czar would not visit him "he goes to Copenhagen every year just like a city merchant to dine on a Sunday with his father-in-law." Personal resentments on the part of monarchs do not lead to wars now, as they did in past ages, but they are more liable to do so in Russia and Germany than in any other countries in Europe. The general apprehension of impending trouble is also expressed by the London Echo, a well informed journal, in an editorial from which the following is an extract:

The Triple Alliance between Germany, Austria and Italy may be a guarantee of peace, but the Dual Alliance between Russia and France is more likely than otherwise to be provocative of war. Neither Russia nor France would, if isolated, enter on a war against any of the members of the Triple Alliance, because assailing one would make enemies of the three. What one powerful nation like France or Russia would not do single-handed, the two allied together might undertake with less hesitation. And the fear is now that a Dual Alliance has been entered into, that a comparatively slight provocation, in the present temper of France, might precipitate hostilities.

It cannot be denied that a change for the worse has, within the last two or three months, come over the spirit of France. There is a fiercer war feeling in France against Germany to-day than there has been for years past. The feeling is finding expression in the speeches of public men, in newspaper articles, and the confident attitude assumed. France will say to-day and do to-day what it would not say or do before the understanding with Russia. Whatever in reality may have been agreed between the two Governments (it may be much or it may be little, and it is more likely to be little than much), it has increased the chances of war, because fuel has been added to the fire, and sparks may produce a conflagration.

THE WATERED LILIES.*

"We have this treasure in earthen vessels, that the excellency of the power may be of God, and not of us." (II. Cor. 4: 7.)

THE Master stood in His garden,
Among the lilies fair,
Which his own right hand had planted
And trained with tend'rest care;

He looked at their snowy blossoms,
And marked with observant eye
That His flow'rs were sadly drooping,
For their leaves were parched and dry.

"My lilies need to be watered,"
The heavenly Master said;
"Wherein shall I draw it for them,
And raise each drooping head?"

Close to His feet, in the pathway,
Empty and frail and small,
An earthen vessel was lying,
Which seemed of no use at all.

But the Master saw and raised it
From the dust in which it lay,
And smiled as He gently whispered,
"This shall do My work to-day.

"It is but an earthen vessel,
But it lay so close to Me;
It is small, but it is empty—
That is all it needs to be."

So to the fountain He took it,
And filled it full to the brim:
How glad was the earthen vessel
To be of some use to Him!

He poured forth the living water
Over His lilies fair,
Until the vessel was empty,
And again He filled it there.

He watered the drooping lilies
Until they revived again;
And the Master saw with pleasure
That His labor had not been in vain.

His own hand had drawn the water
Which refreshed the thirsty flow'rs;
But He used the earthen vessel
To carry the living show'rs.

And to itself it whispered,
As He laid it aside once more,
"Still will I lie in His pathway,
Just where I did before.

"Close would I keep to the Master,
Empty would I remain,
And perhaps some day He may use me
To water His flow'rs again."

AN ABSENT-MINDED TRAVELLER.

Talking recently with an official in a large railroad station, he expressed the opinion that no men living so needed the virtue with which the Patriarch Job was gifted as did a man in uniform on duty in a railroad depot. One instance in point he gave by way of illustration: "Only yesterday," said he, "when a train came up to this platform, a man asked me, 'Is this my train?' and I said, 'Where are you going?' he replied, 'Ay, but I don't know, I've forgotten.' 'Well,' I said, 'If you don't know, I don't, you must think, and tell me, then I shall know if this is your train or not.' And," he continued, "he was some time before he could remember." There are not many travellers so absent-minded as that one, but how many are busy on the journey of life, who, if they were suddenly asked the question, "Whither goest thou?" they either do not know, or at best say, "I hope I am going to heaven." It would be well if they would consider and turn in the right direction.

* A. H. McC., writes, concerning this beautiful poem: "The writer, Miss Viney, was an invalid, and beautifully describes her own case in the 4th verse."

What may be said of France is applicable in a less degree to Russia. Russia, for the time, feels France almost at her feet. Russians are feted, and everything Russian is flattered by Frenchmen. This is the most curious fact of modern times. The Russian Bear and the Gallic Cock are fraternizing and swearing eternal friendship. Russia asks for the loan of twenty millions sterling; France offers seven times that sum; and we are told in magniloquent language that the two nations possess between them one hundred and forty millions of inhabitants, and that they have it in their power to mould the destinies of Europe and of Asia. In the meantime Germany, which was vigilant before, has to keep her eye on the frontier, and keep her hand on the sword. Germany has, in fact, to pay an immense price for the annexation of Alsace and Lorraine. And not only Germany; Austria and Italy are in the swim. And not only Germany, Austria, and Italy, but all Europe. Everything is in a state of unrest and uncertainty, partly, if not mainly, because German military authorities, in a moment of victory, annexed Alsace-Lorraine. The difficulty has assumed enormous and alarming proportions. Should a war break out, it cannot be a small one, and may be a great one, the greatest perhaps of this century, and a war which will write its history on desolated nations, and disgrace civilization. The present agonizing suspense is only an evil next to war.

THE GOSPEL ON THE CANALS.

ON August 6, of last year, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD published a picture of the Mission Boat, which the Rev. R. W. McAll was using on the Seine and at the seaports on the coast of France, for Gospel services. The work was continued again this summer and with marked success. The services on board the boat were not only well attended and by the class they were designed to reach, but there were permanent results in the conversion of souls and in introducing the Gospel in places where Protestant teaching was unknown. So much good has been done, and, there being no rent to pay, the cost has been so small, compared with the cost of the work in Paris and other large cities, that Mr. McAll is now trying to extend it by getting a boat which can be used on the smaller rivers and canals of France. "Nearly all French rivers have been 'canalized,'" says the American McAll Record, "wherever they were not naturally navigable, and have been provided with locks and a towing path. They are connected by fine artificial canals, some of them marvels of engineering skill, cutting through regions most unfrequented by tourists. Such a canal runs through the heart of Brittany, for example, that most picturesque and even yet almost unknown country. It has been made by uniting a number of Breton rivers, and thus opens interior communication between the great naval seaport, Brest, and the rich commercial city, Nantes. In both of these cities Mr. McAll has established mission stations which are now flourishing and could be made the headquarters of the work. With a good boat suited to the navigation of the canals it would be possible to penetrate into the remotest regions of France and bring to a people, who for generations have sat in darkness, the marvellous light of the Gospel." It is estimated that the boat (a picture of which is here given) will cost about $6,000 of which $1,000 has already been raised. If the balance can be secured, it will be possible to traverse thousands of miles of inland waterways and reach innumerable small towns and villages now unenlightened by the Gospel.

"How glorious," says the McAll Record, to thus carry the tidings of great joy to charcoal burners and wood cutters in lonely forests, to dwellers in farm hamlets, to the citizens of small towns, to thousands upon thousands to whom the story, old to us, is absolutely new and undreamed of.

FORTY COMING WONDERS.

A NEW and enlarged edition has been issued of Rev. M. Baxter's famous work on the unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible entitled Forty Coming Wonders. It contains 540 pages and fifty full-page illustrations of the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. In an appendix is a resume of the opinions of eminent expositors of prophecy, ancient and modern. Price (including postage), seventy-five cents. May be had of Rev. George A. Sparks, 92 Bible House, New York.

AFRAID TO DO RIGHT.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Nov. 29. John 19:8; Luke 23:23, 24; Mark 15:15.

PILATE'S character has always been a fruitful subject of argument. Before the Acta Pilati in Greek and the two Latin epistles purporting to have been written by him to the Emperor about Christ, were discovered to be spurious, the problem was more difficult than now. Apart from those documents his character presents no traits that are unfamiliar to us. Unhappily, the type is only too common even in the fuller light of our day. Everyone knows men who can be so persuaded, or bullied, or threatened that they will do what they believe to be wrong. Men, too, with an ambition to be popular, who to gain popularity, or, having gained it, to avoid losing it, will act contrary to their conscience. A Congressman or State official whose term has nearly expired and who is hoping for a reelection, might be placed in a similar dilemma. His honest opinion about some question on which he must take action may differ from that of the party whose votes elected him and on whose votes he must depend for reelection. Has he the courage to act as he believes right, or will he waive his own opinion and act as the party wishes? If the latter, he is a man who in Pilate's place would have acted as Pilate did. A business man who, as a youth, has adopted high principles as to the strict line of integrity that a Christian should follow in business, enters business on his own account. Competition is severe and his rivals are crowding him. They are unscrupulous in advertising and other business details. Will he use their weapons, misrepresent his goods, underpay his employees and resort to tricks common in the trade, but intrinsically deceptive, in order to maintain his position? If so, he is a man who in Pilate's place would have acted as he did? The instances might be multiplied indefinitely.

Pilate was the Roman procurator of Judaea acting under the governor of Syria. He was the sixth who had held the office. He was appointed in A. D. 25-26 and governed for ten years. It is believed that he was descended from a manumitted slave, but German tradition gives it that he was the illegitimate son of Tyrus, king of Mayence, and, being sent to Rome, committed a murder, for which he was banished to Pontus, where he was successful in subduing the barbarous tribes and so earned the Emperor's favor and was rewarded by being made procurator of Judaea. He outraged the religious feelings of the Jews by setting up the Roman eagles in Jerusalem and by acts of corruption and severity which the Emperor, had he known of them, would have disapproved. We learn from Josephus that his yielding to the people in the case of Jesus did not save him from disaster. In A. D. 36, he was summoned to Rome to answer the complaint of cruelty brought against him by the Samaritans, and Eusebius adds that being wearied with a succession of misfortunes he killed himself.

That he was anxious to save Jesus was evident. His perception that there was really no basis for a capital charge; and that the accusations of the priests and the mob were prompted by envy and jealousy, is manifested plainly in each of the accounts we have of the trial. But he was anxious to conciliate the people. The thinly veiled threat of exposure to the Emperor, "If thou let this man go, thou art not Cæsar's friend" made him tremble. It would not injure him at Rome if the details of this case were reported to the Emperor, but if he exasperated the Jews in this case, they could send other reports of his administration which would have injured him and so he was willing to oblige them by sacrificing the prisoner. Jesus must have appeared to him a common man whose fate was of small account as compared with his own interests, and he gave him up. Little could he have imagined that to the end of time that one act of his life would set his name on a pinnacle of infamy from which it would never be taken down. Little could he have dreamed that the Prisoner, for whom he would not sacrifice his interests, would one day have millions of followers, who would stand ready to give up life itself for him and count it glory to die in his cause. Little do men realize now, when they sacrifice Christ, that they may win money, or power, or popularity, what they will miss when Christ comes in his glory.

A NOTABLE BUILDING.

THE imposing edifice, a picture of which appears in this column, is an evidence of what an earnest aggressive Young Men's Christian Association can do when it has made up its mind to have a new home. This is the building which the Young Men's Christian Association at Wilkesbarre, Pa., will shortly occupy. It will cost in all $110,000, of which the site, located only 150 feet from the centre of the Public Square of the city, costs $19,000; the building itself will cost $81,000 and the furnishing $10,000. It will be five stories in height, and the whole will be used for association purposes except the three stories on the ground floor and a few lodging rooms on the top floor. The arrangements are excellently planned and will ensure convenience of access to every branch of the Association's work and adequate accommodation for each department. In the basement at the rear will be the gymnasium and plunge-baths. On the second floor are located the large auditorium, men's meeting-room, library, reading-rooms, members' parlor and reception-hall. The third floor contains the upper part of the auditorium, which is two stories in height, the kitchen, dining-rooms, class-rooms, etc. The top floor is divided up into smaller rooms, some of which are occupied by the janitor and various officers. The committee in charge and the energetic secretary, Mr. S. M. Bard, deserve to be congratulated on the excellent arrangements, and the association on the beautiful and commodious home it will have for its beneficent work.

WORDS TO BREAD WINNERS.

GIRLS who are earning their own livelihood and who wear the silver cross often long to know how they may do something worthy of it. Mrs. Bottome has a few words for such girls in the Ladies' Home Journal. She says: What shall I say to you who work day and night—school-teachers, stenographers, dress-makers—standing behind counters? You who write—"We have little leisure, because after school, or office hours, we study, practice and are at work in home duties?" Now, you say to me, "What shall we do?" O, you brave girls, what shall I say? I should say "do nothing," if I had not met a noble girl in the middle of the State of New York, who was engaged, just as you are, and who told me that the greatest joy she had was in going to the almshouse every Sunday afternoon, as a King's Daughter, to help and cheer those who were so much worse off than herself. And she had formed a Circle of her friends, and they were as happy as they could be over some old women who thought they were angels because they visited them every Sunday afternoon. And when I saw a number of girls, whose wages did not exceed three dollars a week, supremely happy finding some poor folks that they might bring them and wait on them at a Thanksgiving supper prepared by these same girls, I said, "Well, I give it up!" So I will not say to you, "do nothing," for I know how much you are doing, and I am so thankful for it. Keep clearly before your mind the one thought of being helpful to others. The way will open; the opportunity will come to you. May be it will be the winning of others in the store where you work to put on the cross; to help them to be patient with people who are trying, or to cheer some girl who is despondent. Do not think any work small that helps one human heart.

A CALIFORNIA CIRCLE.

AMONG the reports of Circles of King's Daughters noticed in the Silver Cross is a very interesting letter from a member of a Circle in Oakland, Cal. The writer says: "There had been some members in the original Circle who were not Christians. One young lady said: 'I cannot join the new Order for I am not the King's Daughter.' The Circle could not give her up, and agreed to be united in prayer for her, and their prayer has been answered, for she has been converted."

"We have a 'Whatever Ten,' a 'Silent Ten,' and a 'Financial Ten.' The last appears as though it had no spiritual sides, but it has. When we organized we took five cents each of our money and consecrated it to the Master's use. With it we purchased something, which was marked ours, and sold at a small advance, and the new amount expended a second time. We have a year in which to use our money, and then we will meet and give the history of each five cents. My five cents has, in three months, become $1.25." This same Ten has each a box which receives all the dimes and half dimes we do not really need. For instance, if we walk when we expected to ride, that fare goes into the box; and we find we can save a good many ice-cream and soda treats.

THE NEW YORK SOCIETIES.

How valuable is the aid rendered to the work of the Church of Christ by the Societies of Christian Endeavor, may be realized by the figures recently presented to the New York State Convention at Utica. Mr. Jackson, the State Secretary, announced that during the past year there had been no less than 7200 conversions reported. Several of the speakers, referring to the fact, regarded it as the mere beginning of a much greater harvest yet to come; but what does it mean? Seven thousand young people rescued from the power of sin and pledged to Christ. Seven thousand new influences affecting their families, their companions, and the towns in which they live. The fact realized in its momentous meaning as to themselves and others is thrilling. The State now has 2200 Societies with a membership of 120,000, of which three-fourths are active members and one-fourth associate members. The societies are divided among the denominations as follows: Presbyterian, 720; Baptist, 530; Methodist, 350; Congregational, 250; Reformed, 210; Disciples, 38; Lutheran, 20; Quaker, 10; Episcopal, 15; Union, 70. We now have something over forty-five Unions in this State. The Convention elected the following officers for the year 1892: President—Rev. H. W. Sherwood, of Rondout. Vice-President, Rev. G. E. Soper, of Rochester. Secretary, H. D. Jackson, of Buffalo. Treasurer—Geo. W. Cooper, of Albany.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR IN MISSOURI.

At the recent Convention of Christian Endeavor Societies in Missouri, held at Springfield, the following figures were given by the Secretary: There are now in the State of Missouri 527 societies with over 20,000 members, an increase of 170 societies and 5,000 members over last year. The number of Junior societies has been doubled. One unique society was that at Jefferson Barracks, the only Christian Endeavor society in the United States Army. The State treasurer reported a balance in the treasury, and asked for voluntary offerings to carry on the work of the ensuing year. In fifteen minutes $900 were pledged.

We shall be glad to receive from readers who are members of Christian Endeavor Societies, the King's Daughters, etc., reports of the progress of the work in their localities and of any new methods which have been found successful.

TEACH ME THY WAY.

DARK cometh down ere it be late;
I stand amid the shades, and wait,
Not knowing whether left or right
Will bring me to the open gate
Where I can pass to home and light,
O God, with whom is endless day,
Guide Thou my steps; teach me Thy way.

Bid the light shine; and call me where Thy presence fills the strengthening air,
And wisdom, justice, love and peace
Make all Thy world serene and fair,
And righteousness and joy increase
This is the goal. But far I stray;
O bring me back, teach me Thy way.

The distant lights like beacons shine;
The city they illumine is mine;
The friends I love are gathered there,
Give me Thy help, O Guide divine,
For hope and faith are in my prayer;
And morn will break and I shall stand
At day-break in my father-land.

UNCLE JOHN'S TALKS.

He Tells About the Japanese Volcanoes and the Great Idol of Buddha.

THE great earthquake in Japan and the dreadful loss of life it occasioned were discussed in the family circle, and the children naturally expressed sorrow for such a calamity.

"Although we have had at different times earthquake shocks in this country," said the father, "we know nothing of the horrors of living in a land where such disasters are frequent."

"Yes," spoke up Uncle John, "Japan is, above all others, the land of earthquakes."

"Have you been there, uncle?" said Thomas, the others listened intently for the traveler's answer.

"It is now four years since I visited Tokio," said Uncle. "You know the Empire of Japan, or Dai Nippon, as the natives call it, consists of a chain of islands lying between Russia and China, the entire archipelago being nearly 6,000 miles long and 2,000 wide. The largest island is called Hondo—which is simply the Japanese way of saying 'main country.' In shape, the group of islands is like an archer's bow, curved at either end, the arrow-rest or centre being at Tokio, the capital city. All the land that rises from the sea between Kamtschatka and China is really a chain of volcanoes. Many of these are in a constant state of eruption, and one group of islands has been called by the natives Kuriles, which means 'smoke vomiters.'

"On the island of Hondo, where the earthquake took place three weeks ago, there are many great volcanic mountains, the largest being Fusiyama, which is worshipped as sacred by the natives, and from whose altitude of 12,280 feet, smoke almost continually escapes. To ascend Fusiyama, we took steamer to Kobe, going thence by train to Osaka and then going up the Kamagawa to Kioto; then we traveled inland in jinrikshas or native carriages drawn by hand, until we reached a village near the base of the mountain. At a glance, the geological features of the landscape are understood; here and there a circle of woods, winding around the mountain, and as we went higher, great cones of lava and cinders, forming a mountain cap four miles wide. At different points along the upper road priests are met selling relics and trinkets to pilgrims, for the ascent of Yokohama is regarded as a sacred pilgrimage of which the Japanese are very proud. Indeed, a native would rather suffer death than do anything to desecrate the mountain. Quite recently a number of Americans formed a plan to climb Fusiyama and let off skyrockets at the summit. When the two guides found out this purpose they refused to proceed, and as the Americans would not turn back, the guides committed harikari—slew themselves with knives, rather than anger the gods of the mountain. We bought long staves from the priests which helped us considerably, for the path was terribly steep and rocky as we went higher, and ropes and even ladders had to be used."

"At last you reached the top?" inquired one of the children.

"Yes," replied the traveler, smiling. "We had expected to find a plateau with a depression in the centre caused by the crater, but instead we found a rocky circle of lava three miles wide, in huge masses, some of them two hundred feet high, and the whole enclosing an irregular crater about two miles in circumference and two hundred feet deep. The pilgrims occupy little huts dug out of the lava rocks, and we slept in one of these that night."

"What priests were those you met there?" was asked.

"They were both Shinto and Buddhists. Shinto is the oldest worship in Japan and is still recognized as the state religion. Shintoism has as many gods as the ancient Greeks and Egyptians; ancestors are deified and almost every family has one or two gods of its own. A high official in Tokio told me there were 150 great Shinto temples in the country and nearly 200,000 smaller shrines and temples, many of them mere little huts, or images set up by the wayside. I was not surprised when he added that there were 50,000 preachers and 35,000 monks in the empire. Buddhism has a strong following in the centre or most civilized portions of the Empire."

"Our party visited the oldest Buddhist tem-

"They didn't show much respect for their big idol, did they?" was suggested.

"Not a great deal," replied Uncle John, "but about 700 years ago it was rebuilt, and the big Buddha was set up again, his mouth, eyes and flabby face wearing the same inane expression as it did when old Shiomu had him hammered out of bronze, centuries before. I noticed spider-webs strung across the ceiling, some of them recklessly touching the face of the idol, and one had irreverently stuck fast to his nose."

"Christianity has made considerable progress in Japan since 1858, when several ports were opened to trade, and the American missionaries established themselves. One of the most active missionaries in recent years was Mr. J. McLain Brown, whose work among the young men of the University of Tokio was conducted under the auspices of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which supplied the funds and enabled him to carry it on successfully. He was at first connected as a volunteer worker with the Central Mission of Tokio, which was burned down, and he then began the independent mission work with a view of training young Japanese students for the Christian ministry. He labored earnestly in this field until his health gave way and he was compelled to return to the United States."

"Do they have the Bible in Japan, Uncle?"

"Oh yes. Translations of the Scriptures are now widely distributed and in hundreds of places where there were formerly idol shrines to the Buddha, and Shinto gods, churches and missions have sprung up, elevating the whole empire morally and spiritually."

The Power of Example.

A good example exerts an influence that may cover a lifetime. A well known Christian merchant of Philadelphia not long ago had an urgent telegram calling him to see an old friend residing in a suburban town. When he arrived he found his friend very ill and only expected to live for a few hours. In early life, as young men, they had met in that city, in business relations, and it was at that period that the close bond of personal friendship was formed. The one who was about to pass away, had in his young manhood, a cousin, a beautiful young lady, in this city, in whose society both these time an observer across the room of what transpired with his cousin, and though he had never before thought of abstaining from intoxicating beverages, influenced by the example of his friend, he determined to decline. He wished now to make acknowledgment of gratitude for this eventful incident in his life, which had saved him from excesses and ruin which, in his case, would have almost certainly followed the continuance of the drink habit.

A FAMOUS WOMAN'S CHILDHOOD.

FREDRIKA BREMER, the great authoress, and her sisters used to hide in the rooms of their governess or nurse when they heard the step of father or mother. The first duty of each morning was to go to their mother, not for a kiss and a loving look, but to be criticised and scolded if they did not enter the room gracefully.

They had to curtsy at the door, walk slowly up to Madame Bremer, and kiss the tips of her extended fingers. Fredrika could never stand, sit, walk or curtsy well enough to please her mother, writes a recent biographer, and she was often obliged to go through the whole performance several times, and be blamed for her awkwardness besides.

Madame Bremer had three principles in the government of her children—two of which were good and one which was very bad. They were to be kept in ignorance of the evil that is in this world, they were to be thoroughly taught by the best professors, and they were to eat as little as possible. She fancied that eating as much as they wished would make them dull about learning, and vulgar-looking as well; she desired her daughters to become sylph-like and slender.

Breakfast consisted of a tiny basin of cold milk and a very little piece of thin, hard rye biscuit. Dinner was always eagerly welcomed, for then the children were always allowed to eat of three of the four or five dishes which composed the meal; they tasted very good to the poor, half-starved things. At night, the rye bread and cold milk appeared again. Miss Bremer's sister declared in after life that she never had seen bowls so small as those used at home.

Mother-Training.

When the child is in the mother's arms and under the father's care, writes the Rev. S. H. Virgin in Occident, and the visible work of informing the mind and molding character by outward impressions has begun, there must needs be a clear idea of the relation of parent to child, as well as of the impressibility of the child, for any successful work of training. I am sure there is great lack here. The sculptor who had no plan, the weaver who had no design, the lace-worker who had no pattern would produce nothing acceptable. A blow such as a child sometimes receives in an impulse of correction would destroy months of work in other departments. Everything also impresses the young child, from the pattern of the mother's dress to the paper on the wall of the room. Tones of voices are interpreted in the child's soul and direct its rapidly unfolding being.

If all these matters would enter into the parent's thought, the work of training would be much simplified. The substitution of principle for impulse would also better the training. Correction in haste and under strong feeling defeats its purpose. A stubborn purpose has been implanted in the child's soul at the time of a hasty and unbalanced reproof.

Harmonious Living.

LET us, as far as in us lies, not unnecessarily offend, provoke, or imitate others with whom we may be associated in life. To this end, we must scrupulously respect their rights, whether of person, of family, or of property, all which are recognized in the moral law, and which constitute the basis of society. We must also strictly regard the feelings of others, those tender, quick sensibilities with which God has guarded our social relations, and which are in their proper development and exercise a mark of refined and elevated character. And we must further respect even the infirmities of others. Some are constitutionally over sensitive—touchy; some are so through age, and some are so through ill health. Some are specially sensitive upon certain subjects, or with us because of certain experiences in the past. Now, these may all be weaknesses, which ought not to be indulged. Nevertheless, we must regard them—just as a judicious parent regards the shrinking modesty of a timid child, just as we all humor the whims of a dear old grandmother, and tenderly consider the nervousness of a sick friend.

ple in the empire. It is at Nara where in a magnificent structure which took eleven years to build, is enshrined the largest idol in the world,—an image of Buddha, representing the god's body down to the waist. As we advanced, the Dai-Butz, as the priest called it, loomed up seventy feet high,—the god sitting on an immense stone platform ten feet high and 200 feet across—a huge, olive-colored, ugly figure of bronze. The face, which is utterly expressionless, is sixteen feet long, the eyebrow alone being five and a half feet in length and the mouth three feet across. This mammoth image and its temple were built in the reign of the emperor Shiomu 1527 years ago, and were almost destroyed by Taira Shigenira, a rebel chief, 432 years later, but were afterwards rebuilt. Again, nearly 500 years after, during a war between feudal chiefs, the image and temple were levelled to the ground."

friends passed much time. On one occasion she gave an elegant party, at which both were in attendance. During the evening when refreshments were served, she came to the friend of her cousin and asked him to drink with her a glass of wine. Very fond of her the young man was sorely perplexed, but finally declined saying: "I will do anything for you that I properly can, but I cannot drink the glass of wine." Turning from him with somewhat of an air of displeasure, she said: "Well, I will go to —" (her cousin), "He will drink it with me." She crossed the room to her cousin, extended the invitation to him with the air of confident expectation, but he also declined, greatly to her astonishment and not a little to her chagrin.

In this last interview, many years afterward, one thing which passed between those two old friends was the statement of the one who was about to die, to the effect that he was at that

As they came up to the Diapleuston there burst from the summit of the side tower a chorus of trumpets—rich, soft, yet far-sounding. Looking up they saw seventy men standing behind a circular balustrade and chanting through silver trumpets toward all points of the compass.

"How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord of Hosts," went sounding broadly forth over the city.

They were met just within the doors by Alexander himself—to whom Aleph presented his "preceptor and friend" Cimon. The Alabarch received them with great courtesy, and thanked the young man for the service rendered to his daughter the day before; and when Aleph expressed the hope that she had quite recovered from her illness, he said:

"Quite so, she tells me; and so I have brought her with me to give thanks for the good news this morning received that her nurse continues to mend."

And he led the way toward a distant canopy not far from the centre, near which his daughter was sitting. She was simply dressed and closely veiled; but Aleph had no difficulty in recognizing the exquisite shape and bearing of the Gem of Alexandria.

Alexander then said that he had asked them to come somewhat in advance of the congregation, partly in order that they might have time to look about them, and to get familiar with the building before the services began.

"Walk about freely," he continued, "until the trumpets cease summoning; then return and occupy the seats yonder (he pointed.) They are reserved for visitors in accord with us. Meanwhile I have to meet the elders."

He bowed himself away; and they began to look about them. But few people had yet come in. It was the largest and finest synagogue in the world. Just before them, abutting on the east side of the building, was a low platform surrounded by a delicate silver railing and surmounted in part by a canopy of cloth of gold. Under this was an ornate seat curiously wrought in various precious woods. Near the front of the platform stood an equally elaborate reading-desk, with several rolls upon it. By the side of the platform was a door by which Alexander had disappeared: and in front of the platform, arranged in several semicircles, were the famous seventy gilded chairs for seventy elders of the synagogue. Back of these were the seats for the families of the elders with a narrow aisle separating the males from the females. On the first seat to the left of this passage sat Rachel. Behind these seats, and skirted by immense columns on either hand, ran a broad aisle from end to end of the synagogue. The building was so long that the signal for the responses had to be given by a flag to the more remote worshippers; for all were supposed to join vocally in the prayers as read at the centre, though addresses to the people were made simultaneously at several other platforms placed at convenient intervals. The walls were covered with Scripture verses in both Hebrew and Greek, beautifully done in mosaic, one wall with prayer, and other with praises, a third with the Ten Commandments, a fourth with the leading Messianic prophecies. One mystery of the building was the pleasant illumination without any sign of windows or sources of artificial light.

While they were lingering over the Messianic inscriptions they suddenly awoke to the fact that the synagogue was becoming thronged and that the trumpets were about confounding their sonorous chant. So they made their way back, as rapidly as the incoming stream of belated worshippers would allow, to the seats which had been shown them.

Amen, sang the trumpets in long-drawn note from their tower. Amen, answered the packed multitudes on their knees. The door at the side of the platform opened; and the seventy elders, with Alexander and another young man, who strongly resembled him, at their head, entered in long, flowing robes elaborately fringed and decorated on the breast with phylacteries, letters in gold. The leaders ascended the platform: the others passed on to the gilded chairs. The Alabarch seated himself under the canopy: his companion advanced to the lectern, bowed his head upon it for a moment, then placed the talith on his head—and at once the service began.

Began with a doxology—spontaneous, universal, mighty; flooding the whole temple with rhythmic billows of uplifting sound. As the last note died away, the man at the desk began to read from a roll that vivid picture of the consequences to Israel of both obedience and disobedience contained in Deut. 28th—read them sonorously and with great distinctness, but not without something of the artificial and professional in his tone—read them with here and there a word of comment which did not always content itself with the literal sense instead of an allegorical and mystical one. This reading concluded, he waved a small flag; and all the people broke out again into a doxology—this time the entire psalm, beginning with, "Praise ye the Lord; praise the Lord, O my soul; while I live will I praise the Lord," in a rapid and triumphant march of unified sound. He then proceeded to read on his knees, the people all kneeling, the prayer contained in the psalm that begins "Give ear, O shepherd of Israel, thou that leadest Joseph like a flock, thou that dwellest between the cherubims shine forth;" at the conclusion of which he waved his flag again and a universal Amen arose. This was followed by readings from the prophets of selections commonly understood to point to the Messiah. Again the flag waved, and the people exclaimed as with one voice, but in a plaintive tone:

"Though he tarried long, he will surely come."

The reader then became a preacher. His theme was the Messiah. He spoke of the certainty of his coming, of the time and other circumstances of it, of the character and functions that would belong to him, of the way in which he would prove himself, and of the universal current expectation of Him among their own people. He showed that from the beginning of the race hints of him had been given—hints that gradually enlarged and brightened as the ages rolled on, until, in the later prophets, all veils were removed and the dimmest eye could see the King that cometh in the name of the Lord. As to the time—he shared the common belief of the present and the last generation that the time was near, if not already arrived. How could the dates of Daniel be reconciled with any other view? To be sure, some allowance should be made for round numbers: it would not do to say that this or next year is the time for the Coming; but after all it is safe to say in a general way that we are living in the times of Christ. It ought not to surprise them if he should come to-morrow. As to the family from which he is to spring, the place of his birth, the forerunner, Elias, he is to have, there is and can be but one opinion. Exactly how he will prove himself to the people it were hard to say: perhaps by a supernatural beauty and glory of person, perhaps by a mysterious inward voice speaking to the whole nation as it spoke to individual prophets, perhaps only by his wonderful success over all obstacles in becoming our Redeemer and King.

The preacher evidently did not deem it wise to be at all specific on this last point—the conquering and kingly character of the Messiah—in a city held by the Romans for the Cæsars. He contented himself with glittering generalities. He spoke ornately and enthusiastically of the prosperity and felicity of Israel in the golden age that was sure to come. What the Gentiles call by that name was a poor thing compared with that which was knocking at the doors of the Chosen People.

He, however, cautioned his hearers not to allow themselves to be impatient in their waiting for this good time. Their faith might be tried. They must be on their guard against pretenders. It would not be strange if the current expectation should itself produce false Christs. It would seem indeed as if this had already happened. At this moment, as most of them knew, there was a man in Judæa who was making much noise with his claims, but whom the principal men of the nation did not feel able to accept. When the true Messiah comes he doubtless will commend himself to the natural leaders of the people. Meanwhile the people should rest quietly in their various places and occupations.

When the orator had finished, the Alabarch rose and gave the usual invitation to approved persons to speak—immediately adding, however, that he saw that one of their own elders, Simeon the son of Simeon, had returned from Jerusalem, and that whatever account he could give of religious matters there would be acceptable.

A venerable-looking man rose from among the Seventy. He brought salutations from the Sanhedrim at Jerusalem. They had been much disturbed over the case of Jesus of Nazareth to whom the preacher had just referred. The multitude were disposed to listen to him; attributing to him many signs and wonders, and asking whether he is not the Messiah. It was not clear, however, that he himself had put forward any such claim. His Messiahship seemed to be merely an inference of the multitude from his wonderful works at a time when all are on the lookout for the Shiloh. As to the reality of these wonderful works, the brethren of the Great Council and the principal men generally do not seem to call it in question. They concede that Jesus has, with a word or a touch, cured all sorts of incurable diseases; given sight to the blind, hearing to the deaf, wholeness to the maimed, reason to the insane, and even life to the dead. Two of them, Joseph of Arimathea, and Nicodemus, a cousin of the great teacher Gamaliel, go further than this, and affirm that no man could do such mighty works unless God were with him. "If such deeds could not prove a Divine mission, they were at a loss to see how such a mission could ever be proved. How was Moses authenticated?" But the rest agree in ascribing the marvels to magic and evil spirits; especially as there never has been known a time when so many people seemed possessed with demons. They say that they are compelled to resort to this explanation, not merely by the fact that Jesus speaks so unfavorably of the ecclesiastical authorities and of their oral traditions, but still more by the fact that he does not answer in origin, appearance, or aims to the Messiah. The Messiah comes from Bethlehem, Jesus from Nazareth: the Messiah comes from the royal family of David, Jesus from a peasant family of no property or social standing; the Messiah is a mighty King and Deliverer, Jesus is plain in his appearance, associates even with publicans and sinners, and has nothing of the warrior and statesman about him—in fact, says that his kingdom is not of this world. He has even been understood to give out that his mission here is to teach and suffer, rather than to conquer and reign. Such a person differs so widely from what they have been accustomed to expect and from what the Sacred Books have been supposed to promise, that the leading brethren in Judæa, with the exceptions mentioned, are unanimous in ascribing the miracles of Jesus to the Evil One, and in trying to break his influence with the people. Whether they will succeed seems doubtful. But their determination to do so is very strong and will probably lead to severe measures. He was sorry not to be able to judge of the man from personal observation; but Jesus at the time was in Galilee, and could not be reached in the time at command. Besides, it was evident that a visit of Simeon to Jesus would be looked upon as a discourtesy by the chief men, so high runs the tide of feeling.

Such in a few words was the purport of what Simeon said in more.

The reading of the psalm beginning, "Give the king thy judgments O God, and thy righteousness to the king's son;" the waving of the flag; AMEN and AMEN by the people, as with one voice, concluded the service.

The congregation rapidly disappeared through the many doors that suddenly revealed themselves; for the architect had thought it possible that occasion might arise for a hasty evacuation of the premises—had also thought it possible to have the means of egress as unnoticeable by a stranger as were the means of light. But a few of the elders, among whom were Alexander and the preacher, gathered about Simeon, whose chair stood near the daughter of Alexander. Cimon and Aleph had also lingered; it may be with the idea of making some inquiry of Simeon or the preacher. Seeing this, the Alabarch beckoned them near, and, simply introducing them as co-religionists, proceeded to say to Simeon:

"I am sorry that you were not able to see and hear Jesus for yourself."

"My desire was strong to do so; and I did my best to get as near as possible to personal observation. I sought reliable information from all quarters. There seemed to be no difference of opinion, even among his greatest enemies, as to the reality of his miracles."

"What do you understand," inquired another elder, "to be the general character of his teaching? How does he treat our Sacred Writings?"

"With the highest honor. It is agreed on all hands that no word has fallen from him that savors of irreverence toward the Law and the Prophets; on the contrary, he makes them final authorities on all matters of which they speak; and when he rebukes the leaders of the people it is in their name. He does not belong to the synagogue of Malus."

"That is a great point in his favor," said another. "But are his own manners and morals blameless in the view of the Law?"

"I must confess that I heard nothing to the contrary—not being able myself to see wrong in a religious teacher eating and drinking like other people, or in his being accessible to the lowly and sinful."

"Have not I heard you say, brother Philo," said Alexander to the preacher, "that the chiefs of the people charge Jesus with blasphemy? Blasphemy can hardly be considered a point of good behavior."

"I spake as I heard," said Philo. "Perhaps Simeon can tell us whether I heard correctly."

"It seems," said Simeon, "that Jesus has sometimes spoken of himself as the Son of God; and, in a mysterious way, of a certain unity between himself and his heavenly Father; and, probably, it is this lofty way of speaking of himself which has given occasion for the charge of which you speak."

"Do not the prophets sometimes use language equally strong about the Christ?" asked Cimon, deferentially.

"For example," said Aleph: "His name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the mighty God, the everlasting Father."

"Such passages, I believe, have always been understood by many among us as declaring that the Christ will not be a mere man, but will have something of a Divine quality about him," said Alexander, reflectively.

"Perhaps, then," added Cimon, "it is not so much the magnificence of the claims of Jesus that has led the fathers at Jerusalem to view him as a blasphemer, but rather the striking contrast between such claims and the humble appearance and circumstances of him who makes them, and which have already led them to decide against him. Of course, if he is not the Christ, such lofty pretensions are blasphemous—not otherwise."

"But it appears to me," said another elder, Ben Abner, whose dress was specially showy, phylacteries many, and air specially haughty, that the humble condition of the man is itself decisive against him. Our wise men, for generations, have understood from the Scriptures that the Messiah would appear in great splendor as a conqueror and king. For my part I expect no other Messiah, want no other, will have no other. I hope they of Jerusalem will away with the impostor." He spoke with flashing eyes.

"So I think," said half a dozen voices with emphasis and gesture.

"Possibly the friends of Jesus would say," returned Simeon coolly, "that great endings sometimes have small beginnings, and that there is time enough yet for outward splendor. Indeed, I happen to know that this is what some of his friends do say. But others claim, and I must confess that this is what Jesus himself seems to teach, that the prophets have been misunderstood; that the kingdom and the glory and the conquests of which they speak are spiritual and perfectly consistent with a lowly and even suffering Messiah. And for evidence they appeal to the prophecies of Isaiah and other Scriptures. Perhaps our friend Philo, who believes so thoroughly in the allegorical and spiritual meanings of our sacred Books, will not blame this interpretation as some do."

Philo smiled at this, and said that he never intended to spiritualize away the Scriptures. It would be very hard for him to give up the brilliant hopes that had so long been entertained as to the times of the Messiah and what he would do for his Israel.

1. See Gen. 2: 3, 12. As Adam was the Lord's husbandman he probably followed the Divine example. 2. Not given. 3. Father Mathew, in Ireland.

Mrs. M. Hatch, South Eastern, N. Y. Will you please inform me where I can find the poem of which one verse is as follows:

When we've been there ten thousand years,
Bright, shining, like the sun,
We've no less days to sing God's praise
Than when we first began.

Probably some reader of the THE CHRISTIAN HERALD can furnish the information asked.

Mrs. M. E. S. Beloit. What evidence can you give that the soul realizes its existence as soon as released from the body, or that it does not remain in an unconscious state until the resurrection?

See answer to C. K. J., Philadelphia in No. 9 of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. See also the Saviour's words to the thief on the cross: "This day thou shalt be with me in Paradise."

H. N. Luton, Iowa. Is it denying the Master when in a testimony meeting we do not at the request of the minister rise and speak?

No; no man has a right to demand your testimony unless you feel impelled to give it. should come freely and voluntarily. At the same time, if any man who believes in Christ has experienced salvation through him, remains unmoved when the opportunity for publicly confessing the Master arrives, we cannot conceive the condition of such a man's mind.

Subscriber, Amsterdam, N. Y. 1. Is the moral character of George Washington questionable? 2. Does Fanny Crosby dictate her hymns? 3. What are the addresses of William Winter, Robert Burdette, Ex-Gov. St. John, and Edna Dean Proctor?

1. Consult a standard biography. We know no other source of reliable information. 2. I believe so, as she is blind. 3. Address: Winter at N. Y. Tribune, Mr. Burdette at Brooklyn Eagle, Mr. St. John at Topeka, Kansas. Proctor's address we do not know.

Subscriber, N. Y. City. What authority have public speakers for using the plural "we" when referring to themselves individually?

None that we know of. The first person generally used in public speaking and the plural in editorial writing—the latter being a well-honored custom to avoid the appearance of egotism in expressing opinion. As the editor speaks for his public and the orator to his public, the same rule does not apply.

W. H. Jones, Allenton, N. J. What is the difference between the Protestant and Catholic Bibles?

There are typical and verbal differences in translations. Besides, the Douay or Catholic Bible divides the Commandments differently, and includes several apocryphal books. Other portions found in the Vulgate, but omitted from the standard English Scriptures of the Protestants, known as King James' Bible, which is now being gradually superseded by the Revised Version.

Constant Reader, Oberlin, O. 1. Do the signs of the times at the present day point to the downfall of our Republic? 2. What nations are now on the decline? 3. What countries have fallen through corruption? 4. What per cent. of the people of the United States are Christians?

Official extravagance and corruption, and the immorality are infallible premonitions of a nation's decadence. In proportion as these prevail is the danger of our Republic's downfall. 2. Most notably Turkey and Spain. 3. Rome, Egypt, Babylon, Persia and Greece. 4. The spreading of our religion as a nation, it would be proper to classify the entire population as Christian, as distinguished from such other religions as Mohammedanism, Buddhism and Confucianism, but it is impossible to individualize and estimate how many are agnostics, how many infidels, and how many actual converts and followers of Jesus, in the highest spiritual sense.

Subscriber, N. Y. City. Your issue of October 14, has the question, "Can a man who has two living wives be a Christian, provided he has a divorce from the first one?" and is answered by referring to Mark 10: 11, 12 as being the Saviour's own words on this point. Now is not Matt. 19: 3-10 just as good authority, and does it not teach that the pure are not to be sacrificed to the impure?

If a divorce has been obtained on the Scriptural grounds, from the first wife, it is justifiable. A Christian is allowed to procure a divorce on such grounds as Christ indicated. (see Matt. 19: 9.)

E. R. Williams, Va. Did Paul refer to the Old or to the New Testament in his remark to Timothy about the Scriptures being able to make him wise unto salvation? 2. Timothy 3: 15.

Timothy could not have been familiar from a child with the New Testament in the form in which we have it. The very epistle in which the words occur, which forms part of the New Testament, obviously could not have been written then. Probably the Gospel of Mark was in existence, but it is doubtful if any other part of the New Testament could have been accessible to the boy. The Old Testament, however, would be taught him by his mother, who was a Jewess, and who appears to have had charge of him after the death, or in the absence of his Greek father. Christ's words in reference to the Old Testament Scriptures (John 5: 39), justify Paul's declaration.

M. C., Vandalia, Mich. What are the best helps for a poor man, who is just entering the ministry? What kind of books should he have and where can he procure them?

The best helps are Henry's Commentaries, a good Biblical Encyclopedia and an Oxford Teachers' Bible. The Commentaries can be procured second-hand of some bookseller; the Encyclopedia will cost more and may require some saving and self-denial; the Oxford Teachers' Bible you can procure by sending $2 and a new subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. These three furnish a whole library of valuable information to the beginner in the ministry.

ACROSS RUSSIA.*

Czar Peter's Metropolis.

PETERSBURG, like Washington, is a city of magnificent distances. The streets are wide and very long and with few exceptions, far from clean. The open squares are of immense size; the houses and public buildings are upon the same scale, and yet the impression which is produced upon the mind is not one of grandeur but of attempted greatness. There is a saying of a Russian poet: "Human hands built Rome; divine hands created Venice; but he who sees St. Petersburg, may well say 'This town is the work of the devil.'"

Peter the Great knew what he was about, when he founded his capital on the morasses of the Neva. He wanted, as Algaroth says, "a window by which the Russians might look out into civilized Europe." He knew that his subjects were barbarians and that if Russia was to rise in power and hold a place among the nations, civilization must come in, and it could come in at that time only by way of the Baltic Sea. He meant to bring the arts of civilized life into Russia and also to draw the Russian nobles away from the Asiatic indolence of the interior provinces to an active and bustling seaport, connected with the western world, and he accomplished his purpose. Thieves, criminals and noblemen alike were compelled to assist in building the city, for two thousand of the former who had been sent to Siberia were set at work here, and every noble and merchant was obliged to build a house in the new city. The wild beasts disputed the territory with its inhabitants even after Peter had built his own house, and a church to St. Peter and St. Paul.

How an Emperor Died.

The vanity and emptiness of earthly treasures was brought forcibly home to the heart, when we went from these magnificent rooms (in the Winter Palace), to the chamber where Nicholas the First died during the Crimean War. It was a small plain room, with his hard camp-bedstead, military cloak, helmet and sword, just as they were left thirty-six years ago. After the battle of Alma, his constitution yielded to the enormous strain which had been put upon it, but his fortitude did not desert him. When his physician told him he must die, he simply said: "I forgive my enemies; telegraph to my subjects: 'Your Emperor is dying.'"

Then he blessed his children and grandchildren, thanked his ministers and the army for their bravery at Sebastopol, and calling his son to his bedside, he said: "My great wish has been to take upon myself all the toils and duties of a sovereign, and to leave you a flourishing and well-ordered empire. God has ordered otherwise. Now, I am going to pray for Russia and for you. After Russia, I have loved you more than anything else on earth." And so he died. Alas! the successor from whom he so tenderly parted most to meet a fate tragical and piteous beyond most of the royal tragedies which history records.

A Russian Betrothal.

In former times there was an interesting ceremony here on Whit-Monday, called "choosing the bride." Young women, arrayed in their best clothes and ornamented with all the jewels they could beg or borrow, were ranged in lines by their mothers under the trees. The young men were paraded up and down in front of the blushing beauties by their fathers. If there were any signs of mutual interest or attraction between the young people, the parents would converse and manage to introduce the children to each other. An acquaintance followed and the way was clear for negotiations, betrothal and marriage. So eager were the mothers to make good matches for their daughters that in order to increase their attractiveness, they sometimes loaded them with gold and jewelry till their natural charms were quite hidden. There is a story of one Russian mother who, being at a loss to think of any fresh charm, made a necklace of silver-gilt teaspoons.

In the Thieves Market.

The "Thieves' Market" (in St. Petersburg) is a strange sight! We drove there under a careful escort. Several thousand acknowledged thieves were crowded into stalls, and shops, and booths, and tents, and in the open square, with their goods on the dirty pavements. The din was frightful and a more repulsive and dreadful mass of human beings I have never seen. The cunning and eager faces, with thin lips and quick, glancing eyes of restless fear, haunted my dreams for many nights. Beautiful silver and clothing worn to rags, false jewels and bad bank notes are for sale. It is a capital place for a foreigner to be cheated and robbed. We were warned to remember the service where it is said "we brought nothing into this world and it is certain that we can carry nothing out;" for the stranger who goes in full, may not get away without having his purse cut out of his pocket, his handkerchief removed and the very rings, stripped off his fingers. Kriloff gives a conversation between two Kupzi which illustrates how the rogues in the bazaar cheat and circumvent each other. "See, cousin," says one, "how God has helped me to-day. I have sold for 300 roubles some Polish cloth that was not worth half the money; it was to an idiot of an officer, whom I persuaded that it was fine Dutch. See—here is the money—30 fine red bank notes, absolutely new."

"Show me the notes, my friend. They are every one of them bad. Out upon you, fox! Do you let yourself be cheated by a wolf?"

The annoyance of breaking lamp-chimneys need not be borne.

Get tough glass chimneys. Macbeth's "pearl top" and "pearl glass" are tough against heat; they do not break, except from accident.

They are also clear, transparent, not misty or milky; they fit and stand upright; shape and proportions are right to direct the draft upon the flame.

They cost a little more than rough and wrong chimneys of common glass that break continually.

COALS OF FIRE.

A New Way of Catching a Thief and What Came of It.

MAN had been in the habit of stealing corn from his neighbor, who was a member of the Society of Friends. Every night he would go softly to the crib, and fill his bag with the ears which the good old Friend's toil had placed there. Every morning the old gentleman observed a diminution of his corn pile. This was very annoying, and must be stopped—but how? One said, "take a gun, conceal yourself, wait till he comes and fire." Others said, "catch the villain, and have him sent to jail."

But the Friend was not prepared to enter into such measures. He wanted to punish the offender, and at the same time to bring about his reformation, if possible, so he fixed a trap close to the hole through which the man would thrust his arm in getting the corn.

The neighbor proceeded on his thieving mission at the hour of midnight, bag in hand. Unsuspectingly he thrust in his hand to seize some corn, when lo! he found himself unable to withdraw it. In vain he tugged and pulled, and sweated, and alternately cried and cursed. His hand was fast, and every effort to release it only made it more secure. After a time the tumult in his breast measurably subsided. He gave over his useless struggles, and began to look around him. All was silence and repose. Good men were sleeping comfortably in their beds, while he was compelled to keep a dreary, disagreeable watch through the remainder of that long and tedious night, his hand in constant pain from the pressure of the clamp which held it. His tired limbs, compelled to sustain his weary body, would fain have sunk beneath him, and his heavy eyes would have closed in slumber, but lo! there was no rest or sleep for him. There he must stand and watch the progress of the night, and at once desire and dread the return of morning. Morning came at last, and the Friend looked out of his window and found that he had "caught his man."

What was to be done! Some would say, "Go out and give him a good horse-whipping, just as he stands, and then release him; that will cure him." But not so said the Friend. Such a course would have sent the man away embittered, and muttering curses of revenge. The good old man hurried on his clothes, and started to the relief and punishment of his prisoner.

"How does thou do?" said he as he came within speaking distance. The poor culprit made no answer but burst into tears.

"Oh, fie!" said the Friend, as he proceeded to release him, "I am sorry that thou hast got thy hand fast. Thou hast put it into the wrong place or it would not have been so."

The man looked crest-fallen, and begging forgiveness, hastily turned to make his retreat.

"Stay, friend, thy bag is not yet filled. Thou needest corn, or thou would not have taken such pains to get it. Come, let me fill it," said the Friend.

The poor fellow was obliged to stand and hold the bag, while the old man filled it, interspersing the exercise with the pleasantest conversation imaginable, all of which was like daggers in the heart of his mortified victim.

The bag was filled, the string tied, and the sufferer hoped to be soon out of the presence of his tormentor. But again his purpose was thwarted.

"Stay," said the Friend, as the man was about to hurry off, having uttered once more his apologies and thanks. "Stay, Ruth has breakfast ready ere this; thou must not think of going without breakfast. Come, Ruth is calling."

This was almost unendurable. This was "heaping coals" with a vengeance! In vain the mortified neighbor begged to be excused, in vain he pleaded to be released from this so great a punishment. The Friend was inexorable, and he was obliged to yield.

Breakfast being over, "Now," said the old farmer, as he helped his victim to shoulder the bag, "if you need any more corn come in the daytime and thou shall have it."

With what shame and remorse did the guilty man turn from the dwelling of the Friend! He never again troubled the Friend's corn crib. He at once repented and became a reformed man. He was afterward heard to relate, in a meeting, the substance of this story and he attributed his conversion, under God's blessing, to the course the Friend had so mercifully pursued to arrest him in his downward career.

FLASH & LIGHTNING

turns the air to ozone—makes it life giving. How do you know? Your lungs tell you. How? They give it to your blood which hurries it through your body. In four minutes every part of you is the better for a full breath of fresh air. You know it all over. So much for a flash of lightning. Now for a discovery of science. Drs. Starkey and Palen's Compound Oxygen is exactly similar in composition and effects to the clearer air of the lightning's flash. The manner of application is exactly the same, the proof exactly similar. How do you know? You feel it. You feel it all over. Nature's help, in nature's way, for nature's needs—that's Compound Oxygen. It was discovered more than twenty years ago. Ever since, and in widening circles it has given strength to the weak, hope to the despondent, and years of life to those given over to die. We can prove this to any one who could be convinced that there ever lived such a man as George Washington. The evidence can be had for asking.

Revised Edition - - - 140th Thousand.

OUR COUNTRY.

By DR. JOSIAH STRONG,

Paper, 30 cts. Cloth, 60 cts.

THE MOST POWERFUL BOOK OF THE CENTURY ON AMERICA.

This revision, which is based on the census of 1890, shows the changes of the last ten years and pictures the religious, social, and economic conditions and tendencies of our country to-day, thus adding to the value of the earlier editions the merit of being the first general application of the revelations of the recent census to the discussions of the great questions of the day. The present edition has been printed from entirely new plates, and enlarged by the addition of more than one-third new matter. Diagrams have also been employed to illustrate some of the more startling facts and comparisons.

THANKSGIVING JOYS.

A Happy and Contented Nation's Gratitude to the Lord of the Harvest—Pleasant Memories of Old Time Thanksgivings.

EVERYWHERE give us full organ to-day. Pull out the glad stops, and while we pray and while we sing let us make a joyful noise unto the Rock of our salvation. Gather your families together. Let your children be arrayed in their brightest robes. In the morning let the temples of God ring with hosannas, and in the night let your homes be filled with congratulation, laughter and song. Turn on all the lights, bracket, chandelier and candelabra. Throw another armful of firewood on the hearth and let the fire blaze out cheerily. When you and I are gone and our children go out and look at the place where we sleep, may they be enabled to say: "There rest the father and mother who knew how to make their children happy on Thanksgiving Day."

On such a time as this shall we not render thanksgiving to God? It was not a great while ago when governments forbade all religious assemblages; now they invoke them. The father, the husband, and the brother sit now at the end of the pew through custom—a custom established in the dark ages of persecution, when it was necessary for the male members of the family to sit at the head of the church pew, armed for defence of those who could not defend themselves. Now, on Thanksgiving Day we meet in churches at the call of secular authority.

No Thanksgiving ever found so many happy and contented people in the United States as this. There were more good breakfasts this morning than any other Thanksgiving morning since this national habit was established. The coffee was better, the intermixture of chicory less observable, and the butter was honest butter, made in honest churns, and the milk was milk, and the meat you could chew, and more people rose from the table thankful than on any similar morning.

Then we have not only the present surroundings to make us happy, but our minds are crowded with vivid reminiscences. On a day like this, the memory becomes a kaleidoscope, and every minute the scene changes. You give to the kaleidoscope of memory a turn and there they are, natural as life, around the country hearth on a cold winter night. Fear the hickory fire crackle and see the shadows flit up and down the wall! Games that sometimes well-nigh upset the chairs and witch stories that made the neighbors' boys afraid to go home after dark. Hickory nuts on one dish, roseate apples on the other. The boisterous plays of "More Bags on the Mill," "Leap Frog," "Catcher," around and around the room until some one got hurt and a kiss was offered to make up the hurt, the kiss more resented than the hurt. High old times! Father and mother got up and went into the next room because they could not stand the racket. Then, instead of compunctions of conscience, a worse racket. But now the scene is fading out. The old fireplace is down, and the house is down with it. One of those boys went to sea and was never heard of. Another became squire in the neighboring village. Another went to college and became a minister. Another died the following summer, and they are all gone, and you had better turn the kaleidoscope quickly or you will get us all crying.

There! Turn it no further, for I want to see that old Thanksgiving dinner. Father at one end, mother at the other end, the children between, wondering if father will ever get done carving the turkey. Oh, that proud, strutting hero of the barnyard, upside down, his plumes gone and minus his gobble. Stuffed with that which he can never digest! The day before at school, we had learned that Greece was south of Turkey, but at that table we found that turkey was bounded by grease. The brown surface waiting for the fork to plunge hash! Not mince pies with profound mysteries of origin! But mother made them, chopped the meat for them, spiced them, sweetened them, flavored them, and laid the lower crust and the upper crust, with here and there a puncture by the fork to let you look through the light and flaky surface into the substance beneath. You deluded New Englanders can talk till you are gray about your pumpkin pies for Thanksgiving day; give me an old-fashioned New Jersey mince pie. Of the ten at that table all are gone save two—some in village church-yard, some in city cemetery—but we shall sit with them yet at a brighter banquet. Better turn the kaleidoscope.

The present as well as the past demands your gratitude. I step into your house. You say it is rather small. That is nothing. A large house is a great trouble to keep clean. Small houses are cosy. Beside that, a great house gives children too large expectations, and when married and they have to take a smaller one, they are discontented, saying, "I was never used to such cramped apartments." These lights of your house have flashed upon many a joyous scene, and if the walls could speak they would tell of social party, and Christmas tree, and neighborhood merry-making. These keys have thrummed a carol or wept under the touch of your child, and the portfolio in the rack hath many a well-worn song of Oaken-Bucket and Old Armchair. Instead of the rough-hewn rafters and bare walls among which your grandfathers will weep for you when you are gone. Be thankful to-day that upon your household has come the brightness of childhood.

I step into your dining-hall, and I find that all the world has been waiting on you. Men grew weary and worn in making that carpet. Cabinet-makers toiled faithfully in making this furniture. Sailors were lashed to the storm in bringing you these foreign delicacies. Flocks and herds have fallen under butcher's knife to please your palate. And summer sun and howling storm and drifting snow have sent luxurious contributions to your table.

I step into your library and I find the tables are covered with magazines and newspapers and books fresh from all the publishers. Historians and pamphleteers and fabulists and philosophers of all ages seem to await your bidding.

I am away out in the centre of a field where the harvests of all nations are being reaped. Here is the great American sheaf. Sheaf of wheat, sheaf of rice, sheaf of corn, sheaf floral, agricultural, pomological, mineralogical, literary and moral prosperities—all bound together in one great sheaf. It is kingly, and on its brow is the golden coronal of all the year's sunshine, and in its presence all the sheaves of European and Asiatic harvests bend and fall down, feeling their littleness.

Oh, the sheaf, the golden sheaf, the over-topping sheaf of American prosperity. Other nations surpass ours in antiquities, in titled pomp in art galleries; but in most things their sheaf must bow to our sheaf. I have an idea that the most favored constellation of immensity is the one of which the earth is a star, and of the hemispheres the western is the most favored, and that of the zones the temperate is the most desirable, and that the United States are the best part of the American continent. The best place on earth to live is here. Had it not been so, there would have been 800,000 Americans last year moving into Europe instead of 800,000 Europeans moving into America.

Our national sheaf is larger this year and more golden and more regal and riper and more richly grained than at any time since the Pilgrim Fathers settled New England or the Hollanders founded New York or the Huguenots took possession of the Carolinas. Sheaf of sheaves! While all others bow before it, let it bow in turn before the good Lord of the astride the breast-bone, and with knife sharpened on the jambs of the fireplace, lay bare the folds of white meat. Give to the boy disposed to be sentimental the heart. Give to the one disposed to music the drumstick. Give to the one disposed to theological discussion the "parson's nose." Then the pies! For the most part a lost art. What mince pies, in which you had all confidence, fashioned from all rich ingredients, instead of miscellaneous leavings which are only a sort of glorified

I step into your nursery, and am greeted by the song and laughter of your children. They clap their hands. They hide. They bound away. What bright eyes! what quick feet! what happy hearts! You expect those hands will smooth your locks when they are gray, that these feet will run to your ministrations when you are sick, and that these eyes

THE ACROPOLIS.

Dr. Talmage's latest Sunday morning Sermon, the Sixth of the Series entitled, "From the Pyramids to the Acropolis." Text: "While Paul waited for them at Athens his spirit was stirred in him when he saw the city wholly given to idolatry." Acts 17: 16.

It seemed as if morning would never come. We had arrived after dark in Athens, Greece, and the night was sleepless with expectation, and my watch slowly announced to me one and two and three and four o'clock; and at the first ray of dawn, I called our party to look out of the window upon that city to which Paul said he was a debtor, and to which the whole earth is debtor for Greek architecture, Greek sculpture, Greek poetry, Greek eloquence, Greek prowess and Greek history. That morning in Athens we sauntered forth armed with most generous and lovely letters from the President of the United States, and his Secretary of State, and during all our stay in that city those letters caused every door and every gate and every temple and every palace to swing open before us. The mightiest geographical name on earth to-day is America. The signature of an American President and Secretary of State will take a man where an army could not. Those names brought us into the presence of a most gracious and beautiful Sovereign, the Queen of Greece, and her cordiality was more like that of a sister than the occupant of a throne-room. No formal bow as when monarchs are approached, but a cordial shake of the hand, and earnest questions about our personal welfare and our beloved country far away. But this morning we pass through where stood the Agora, the ancient market-place, the locality where philosophers used to meet their disciples, walking while they talked, and where Paul the Christian logician flung many a proud Stoic, and got the laugh on many an impertinent Epicurean. The market-place was the centre of social and political life, and it was the place where people went to tell and hear the news. Booths and bazaars were set up for merchandise of all kinds, except meat, but everything must be sold for cash, and there must be no lying about the value of commodities, and the Agonomi who ruled the place could inflict severe punishment upon offenders. The different schools of thinkers had distinct places set apart for convocation. The Platonians must meet at the cheese market, the Decelians at the barber shop, the sellers of perfumes at the frankincense headquarters. The market-place was a space three hundred and fifty yards long and two hundred and fifty wide, and it was given up to gossip and merchandise, and lounging, and philosophizing. All this you need to know in order to understand the Bible when it says of Paul, "Therefore disputed he in the market daily with them that met him." You see it was the best place to get an audience, and if a man feels himself called to preach he wants people to preach to. But before we make our chief visits of to-day we must take a turn at the Stadium. It is a little way out, but go we must. The Stadium was the place where the foot-races occurred.

Paul had been out there no doubt for he frequently uses the scenes of that place as figures when he tells us: "Let us run the race that is set before us," and again, "They do it to obtain a corruptible garland, but we an incorruptible." The marble and the gilding have been removed, but the high mounds against which the seats were piled are still there. The Stadium is six hundred and eighty feet long, one hundred and thirty feet wide, and held forty thousand spectators. There is to-day the very tunnel through which the defeated racer departed from the Stadium and from the hisses of the people, and there are the stairs up which the victor went to the top of the hill to be crowned with the laurel. In this place contests with wild beasts sometimes took place, and while Hadrian, the Emperor, sat on yonder height, one thousand beasts were slain in one celebration. But it was chiefly for foot-racing, and so I proposed to my friend that day while we were in the Stadium that we try

Greece, the centre of the world; Attica, the centre of Greece; Athens, the centre of Attica, and the Acropolis the centre of Athens. Earthquakes have shaken it: Verres plundered it. Lord Elgin, the English Ambassador at Constantinople, got permission of the Sultan to remove from the Acropolis fallen pieces of the building, but he took from the building to England the finest statues, removing them at an expense of eight hundred thousand dollars. A storm overthrew many of the statues of the Acropolis. Morosini, the General, attempted to remove from a pediment the sculptured car and horses of Victory, but the clumsy machinery dropped it, and all was lost. The Turks turned the building into a powder magazine where the Venetian guns dropped a fire that by explosion sent the columns flying in the air and falling cracked and splintered. But after all that time and storm and war and iconoclasm have effected, the Acropolis is the monarch of all ruins, and before it bow the learning, the genius, the poetry, the art, the history of the ages. I saw it as it was thousands of years ago. I had read so much about it and dreamed so much about it, that I needed no magician's wand to restore it. At one wave of my hand on that clear morning in 1889, it rose before me in the glory it had when Pericles ordered it, and Ictinus planned it, and Phidias chiselled it and Protogines painted it and Pausanias described it. Its gates, which were carefully guarded by the ancients, open to let you in, and you ascend by sixty marble steps the propylæa, which Epaminondas wanted to transfer to Thebes, but permission, I am glad to say, could not be granted for the removal of this architectural miracle. In the days when ten cents would do more than a dollar now, the building cost two million three two inches in diameter. Wondrous intercolumniations! Painted porticos, architraves tinged with ochre, shields of gold hung up, lines of most delicate curve, figures of horses and men and women and gods, oxen on the way to sacrifice, statues of the deities Dionysius, Prometheus, Hermes, Demeter, Zeus, Hera, Poseidon; in one frieze twelve divinities; centaurs in battle; weaponry from Marathon; chariot of night; chariot of the morning; horses of the sun, the fates, the furies; statue of Jupiter holding in his right hand the thunderbolt; silver-footed chair in which Xerxes watched the battle of Salamis only a few miles away. Here is the colossal statue of Minerva in full armor, eyes of gray-colored stone; figure of a Sphinx, on her head, griffins by her side (which are lions with eagle's beak), spear in one hand, statue of Liberty in the other, a shield carved with battle scenes, and even the slippers sculptured, and tied on with thongs of gold. Far out at sea the sailors saw this statue of Minerva rising high above all the temples, glittering in the sun. Here are statues of equestrians, statue of a lioness, and there are the Graces, and yonder a horse in bronze. There is a statue said in the time of Augustus to have of its own accord turned around from east to west and spit blood; statues made out of shields conquered in battle; statue of Apollo, the expeller of locusts; statue of Anacreon, drunk and singing; statue of Olympodorus, a Greek, memorable for the fact that he was cheerful when others were cast down, a trait worthy of sculpture. But, walk on and around the Acropolis, and yonder you see a statue of Hygieia, and the statue of Theseus fighting the Minotaur and the statue of Hercules slaying serpents. No wonder that Petronius said it was easier to find a god than a man in Athens. Oh, the Acropolis! The most of its temples and statues made from the marble quarries of Mount Pentelicon, a little way from the city. I have here on my table a block of the Parthenon made out of this marble, and on it is the sculpture of Phidias. I brought it from the Acropolis. This specimen has on it the dust of ages, and the marks of explosion and battle, but you can get from it some idea of the delicate lustre of the Acropolis when it was covered with a mountain of this marble cut into all the exquisite shapes that genius could contrive and striped with silver, and aflame with gold. The Acropolis in the morning light of those ancients must have shone as though it were an aerolite cast off from the noonday sun. The temples must have looked like petrified foam. The whole Acropolis must have seemed like the white breakers of the great ocean of time.

But we cannot stop longer here, for there is a hill near by of more interest, though it has not one chip of marble to suggest a statue or a temple. We hasten down the Acropolis to ascend the Areopagus, or Mars Hill, as it is called. It took only about three minutes to walk the distance, and the two hill tops are so near that what I said in religious discourse on Mars Hill was heard distinctly by some English gentlemen on the Acropolis. This Mars Hill is a rough pile of rock fifty feet high. It was famous long before New Testament times. The Persians easily and terribly assaulted the Acropolis from this hill top. Here assembled the court to try criminals. It was held in the night time, so that the faces of the judges could not be seen, nor the faces of the lawyers who made the plea, and so, instead of a trial being one of emotion, it must have been one of cool justice. But, there was one occasion on this hill memorable above all others. A little man, physically weak, and his rhetoric described by himself as contemptible, had by his sermons rocked Athens with commotion, and he was summoned either by writ of law or which of us could run the sooner from end to end of this historical ground, and so at the word given by the lookers-on we started side by side, but before I got through I found out what Paul meant when he compares the spiritual race with the race in this very Stadium, as he says: "Lay aside every weight." My heavy overcoat, and my friend's freedom from such encumbrance showed the advantage in any kind of a race of "laying aside every weight."

We come now to the Acropolis. It is a rock about two miles in circumference at the base and a thousand feet in circumference at the top, and three hundred feet high. On it has been crowded more elaborate architecture and sculpture than in any other place under the whole heavens. Originally a fortress, afterward a congregation of temples and statues and pillars, their ruins an enchantment from which no observer ever breaks away. No wonder that Aristides thought it the centre of all things—hundred thousand dollars. See its five ornamented gates, the keys entrusted to an officer for only one day lest the temptation to go in and misappropriate the treasures be too great for him; its ceiling a mingling of blue and scarlet and green, and the walls abloom with pictures utmost in thought and coloring. Yonder is a temple to a goddess called "Victory without Wings." So many of the triumphs of the world had been followed by defeat that the Greeks wished in marble to indicate that victory for Athens had come never again to fly away, and hence this temple to "Victory without Wings,"—a temple of marble, snow-white and glittering. Yonder behold the pedestal of Agrippa, twenty-seven feet high and twelve feet square. But, the overshadowing wonder of all the hill is the Parthenon. In days when money was ten times more valuable than now, it cost $4,600,000. It is a Doric grandeur, having forty-six columns, each column thirty-four feet high and six feet hearty invitation to come upon that pulpit of rock and give a specimen of his theology. All the wiseacres of Athens turned out and turned up to hear him. The more venerable of them sat in an amphitheatre, the granite seats of which are still visible, but the other people swarmed on all sides of the hill and at the base of it to hear this man, whom some called a fanatic, and others called a mad-cap, and others a blasphemer, and others styled contemptuously "this fellow." In that audience were the first orators of the world, and they had voices like flutes when they were passive and like trumpets when they were aroused, and I think they laughed in the sleeves of their gowns as this insignificant-looking man rose to speak. In that audience were Scholiasts, who knew everything, or thought they did, and from the end of the longest hair on the top of their audience can endure no more. Two thunderbolts are enough. No, in the same breath he launches the third thunderbolt, which, to them, is more fiery, more terrible, more demolishing than the others, as he cries out: "hath made of one blood all nations." Oh, Paul! you forget you are speaking to the proudest and most exclusive audience in the world. Do not say "of one blood." You cannot mean that. Had Socrates, and Plato, and Demosthenes, and Solon and Lycurgus, and Draco, and Sophocles, and Euripides, and Æschylus, and Pericles, and Phidias, and Miltiades blood just like the Persians, like the Turks, like the Egyptians, like the common herd of humanity? "Yes," says Paul, "of one blood, all nations."

Surely that must be the closing paragraph of the sermon. His auditors must be let up from the nervous strain. Paul has smashed the Acropolis and smashed the national pride of the Greeks, and what more can he say? Those Grecian orators, standing on that place, always closed their addresses with something sublime and climacteric, a peroration, and Paul is going to give them a peroration which will eclipse in power and majesty all that he has yet said. Heretofore he has hurled one thunderbolt at a time; now, he will close by hurling two at once—the two thunderbolts of Resurrection and Last Judgment. His closing words were: "Because He hath appointed a day, in the which he will judge the world in righteousness by that man whom he hath ordained; whereof he hath given assurance unto all men in that he hath raised him from the dead." Remember those thoughts were to them novel and provocative: that Christ, the despised Nazarene, would come to be their judge, and they should have to get up out of their cemeteries to stand be-where did you get that crooked back, and those weak eyes from? Ha! Ha! You try to teach us Grecians! What nonsense you talk about when you speak of Resurrection and Judgment. Now, little old man, climb down the side of Mars Hill and get out of sight as soon as possible." "Some mocked." But, that scene adjourned to the day of which the sacred orator had spoken—the day of Resurrection and Judgment.

As in Athens, that evening in 1889, we climbed down the pile of slippery rocks, where all this had occurred, on our way back to our hotel, I stood half way between the Acropolis and Mars Hill in the gathering shadows of eventide, I seemed to hear those two hills in sublime and awful converse. "I am chiefly of the past," said the Acropolis. "I am chiefly of the future," replied Mars Hill. The Acropolis said: "My orators are dead. My law-givers are dead. My poets are dead. My architects are dead. My sculptors are dead. I am a monument of the dead past. I shall never again hear a song sung. I will never again see a column lifted. I will never again behold a goddess crowned." Mars Hill responded: "I, too, have had a history. I had on my heights warriors who will never again unsheath the sword, and judges who will never again utter a doom, and orators who will never again make a plea. But my influence is to be more in the future than it ever was in the past. Oh, Acropolis! I have stood here long enough to witness that your gods are no gods at all. Your Boreas could not control the winds. Your Neptune could not manage the sea. Your Apollo never evoked a musical note. Your god Ceres never grew a harvest. Your goddess of wisdom, Minerva, never knew the Greek alphabet. Your Jupiter could not handle the lightnings. But the God whom ed virtue but expired as a suicide. Your Miltiades was brave against earthly foes, yet died from a wound ignominiously gotten in after-defeat. But my Paul challenged all earth and all hell with this battle-shout: 'We wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places,' and then on the 29th of June, in the year 66, on the road to Ostia, after the sword of the headsman had given one keen stroke, took the crown of martyrdom."

After a moment's silence by both hills, the Acropolis moaned out in the darkness: "Alas! Alas!" and Mars Hill responded: "Hosannah! Hosannah!"

REMAINS OF THE PARTHENON.

"MARS HILL."

Then, the voices of both hills became indistinct, and as I passed on and away in the twilight, I seemed to hear only two sounds—a fragment of Pentelicon marble from the architrave of the Acropolis dropping down on the ruins of a shattered idol, and the other sound seemed to come from the rock on Mars Hill, from which we had just descended. But we were by this time so far off that the fragments of sentences were smaller when dropping from Mars Hill than were the fragments of fallen marble on the Acropolis, and I could only hear parts of disconnected sentences waited on the night air—"God who made the world"—"of one blood all nations"—"appointed a day in which he will judge the world"—"raised him from the dead."

As that night in Athens I put my tired head on my pillow, and the exciting scenes of the day passed through my mind, I thought on the same subject on which as a boy I made my Commencement speech in Niblo's Theatre on Graduation Day from the New York University, viz: "The moral effects of sculpture and architecture," but further than I could have thought in boyhood, I thought in Athens that night that the moral effects of architecture and sculpture depend on what you do in great buildings after they are put up, and upon the character of the men whose forms you cut in the marble: yea! I thought that night what struggles the martyrs went through in order that in our time the Gospel might have full swing: and I thought that night what a brainy religion it must be that could absorb a hero like him whom we have considered to-day, a man the superior of the whole human race, the infidels but pigmies or homunculi compared with him: and I thought what a rapacious consideration it is that through the same grace that saved Paul, we shall confront this great Apostle, and shall have the opportunity, amid the familiarities of the skies, of asking him what was the greatest occasion of all his life. He may say: "The shipwreck of Melita." He may say: "The riot at Ephesus." He may say: "My last walk out on the road to Ostia." But, I think he will say: "The day I stood on Mars Hill addressing the indignant Areopagites, and looking off upon the towering form of the goddess Minerva, and the majesty of the Parthenon, and all the brilliant divinities of the Acropolis. That account in the Bible was true. My spirit was stirred within me when I saw the city wholly given up to idolatry!"

fore him and take their eternal doom. Mightiest burst of elocutionary power ever heard. At those two thoughts of Resurrection and Judgment, the audience sprang to their feet. Some moved they adjourn to some other day to hear more on the same theme, but others would have torn the sacred orator to pieces. The record says: "Some mocked." I suppose it means that they mimicked the solemnity of his voice, that they took off his impassioned gesticulation, and they cried out: "Jew! Jew! Where did you study rhetoric? You ought to hear our orators speak! You had better go back to your business of tent-making. Our Lycurgus knew more in a minute than you will know in a month. Say,

I proclaimed on the day when Paul preached before the astounded assemblage on my rough heights, is the God of music, the God of wisdom, the God of power, the God of mercy, the God of love, the God of storms, the God of sunshine, the God of the land, and the God of the sea, the God over all, blessed forever." Then, the Acropolis spake and said, as though in self-defence: "My Plato argued for the immortality of the soul, and my Socrates praised virtue, and my Miltiades at Marathon drove back the Persian oppressors." "Yes," said Mars Hill, "your Plato laboriously guessed at the immortality of the soul, but my Paul, divinely inspired, declared it as a fact straight from God. Your Socrates praiscraniums to the end of the nail on the longest toe, they were stuffed with hypercriticism and they leaned back with a supercilious look to listen. As in 1889, I stood on that rock where Paul stood, and a slab of which I brought from Athens by consent of the Queen, through Mr. Tricoups, the Prime Minister, and had placed in yonder Memorial Wall, I read the whole story, Bible in hand.

What I have so far said in this discourse was necessary in order that you may understand the boldness, the defiance, the holy recklessness, the magnificence of Paul's speech. The first thunderbolt he launched at the opposite hill—the Acropolis—that moment all aglitter with idols and temples. He cries out, "God who made the world." Why, they thought that Prometheus made it, that Mercury made it, that Apollo made it, that Poseidon made it, that Eros made it, that Pandocus made it, that Boreas made it, that it took all the gods of the Parthenon, yea, all the gods and goddesses of the Acropolis to make it, and here stands a man without any ecclesiastical title, neither a D.D., nor even a reverend, declaring that the world was made by the Lord of heaven and earth, and hence the inference that all the splendid covering of the Acropolis, so near that the people standing on the steps of the Parthenon could hear it, was a deceit, a falsehood, a sham, a blasphemy. Oh, Paul, stop for a moment and give these startled and overwhelmed auditors time to catch their breath! Make a rhetorical pause! Take a look around you at the interesting landscape, and give your hearers time to recover! No, he does not make even a period, or so much as a colon or semicolon, but launches the second thunderbolt right after the first, and in the same breath goes on to say: God "dwelleth not in temples made with hands." Oh, Paul! Is not deity more in the Parthenon, or more in the Theseum, or more in the Erechtheum, or more in the temple of Zeus Olympius than in the open air, more than on the hill where we are sitting, more than on Mount Hymettus out yonder, from which the bees get their honey. "No more!" responds Paul, "He dwelleth not in temples made with hands."

But surely the preacher on the pulpit of rock on Mars Hill, will stop now. His

CHRIST CRUCIFIED.

S. S. Lesson for Dec. 6. By Mrs. M. Baxter,
John 19 : 17-30. Golden Text, I Pet. 3 : 18.

LET us not forget, as we draw near reverently to the cross of Jesus, that his death was perfectly voluntary. He of whom it could be said: "In him was life," and who said of himself, "Because I live, ye shall live also," had perfect control over his own life, as he had over the lives of others. He himself says: "I lay down my life that I might take it again. No man taketh it from me, but I lay it down of myself. I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again." Life and death are alike subject to him. When he suffered it was not by compulsion, no other priest could offer such a sacrifice. Christ "through the eternal Spirit without spot to God!" He saw all human nature under the curse, and the slaves of sin unable to extricate themselves. "Death passed upon all men for that all have sinned." (Rom. 5 : 12.) And Jesus devised a wondrous plan whereby, in his own person, he would meet death in unanswerable righteousness. He would silence the mouth of the adversary for ever. He would make it possible for himself to die who was the life itself, and in him the whole fallen race should receive its death sentence. He "emptied himself, and took upon him the form of a servant," (Phil. 2 : 7), that proud, defiant, human nature might be able to empty itself and serve.

Offered Himself

When Pilate had given the death warrant to the expectant Jews, they led Jesus away, and shortly after, he might have been seen, toiling under the weight of the cross to which he must be nailed.

"Bearing His Cross!"

"Whosoever will come after me, he says, "let him deny himself, and take up [or bear] his cross, and follow me." The world hates the cross, shuns hard things, shields itself from suffering. The true disciple accepts the cross, to which he must be nailed, not gloomily, and in a martyr spirit, but cheerfully, out of love to his Master.

Arrived at the place of public execution, where the worst of criminals suffered, they crucified Jesus. He "endured the cross, despising the shame," (Heb. 12 : 3), because of the joy before him." To him it was the hour when the Son of Man was glorified. Oh how often is that which man despises glorious in the sight of God! This was a death out of which the life of a world should come; this was a shame which should bring glory to God throughout an endless eternity. Man heard the sentence of Pilate and saw the terrible execution of a supposed criminal. But how did things look on the heaven side? All which earth calls heroism pales before the death of the Son of God. Many a devoted man has died for his country because it was his, and his interests were bound up in it. But here was One who gave his very life for his enemies, for those who hated him! On the earth side, it looked as though all was lost, the claim of Jesus to be the Jews' Messiah had failed in this ignominious way, and the Leader who had raised such great expectations in many hearts was actually undergoing his execution as a common felon! His disciples who had been faithful up till now, abandoning him, no eye to pity, no hand to save;—it was a lost cause in the eyes of man. But, on the heaven side, how different! It was "God manifest ... the flesh," who hung there, tasting death for every man, that he might take away the sting of death, and place himself between man and death. Thus, in his own person, he abolished death as being man's conqueror, so that they who keep his saying should not see death, but the glory, even in the moment of dissolution.

From the heaven side, the dark, awful clouds of sin, which rested on him, and shut out even his Father's face, was penetrated by the sunlight of his own sacrifice. As the Man, the second Adam, he accepted and bowed beneath the penalty of sin, shouldering the mighty liability of a world's guilt, and in the bowing of his head to the stroke, He "bore our sins in his own body on the tree," and fulfilled the law by suffering capital punishment on behalf of every son of man, since he, as Creator, was infinitely more worthy in himself than the whole created race for which he suffered. That which looked like shame on earth's side was glory in heaven. The intrinsic, infinite superiority of Jesus was so manifest all through his sufferings and death. In Gethsemane, under the unspeakable agony of that hour of bloody sweat, he was nevertheless so above his sufferings, in his wondrous freedom from every thought of self, that he could excuse his sleeping disciples in the words, "The spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak." When the officers from the Chief priests came, under the conduct of Judas, to apprehend him, and they "went backward, and fell to the ground because of the power of his presence, Jesus was still the unresisting Lamb, mightier in his submission than he could have been in resisting. Heaven's light could mark all this. Man is tainted by evil association, but Jesus could touch the leper without being defiled, could let the abandoned woman weep over, wipe, and kiss his feet, with the only result that the holy purity in him flowed out to and cleansed her. And now, as he hung upon the cross, between two thieves, he was still Master of the situation, and he could say to the former malefactor, "To-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise." (Luke 23 : 43.) Wherever Jesus was on earth, he was as the Lamb, meekly enduring, opening not his mouth, and yet, in suffering, he conquered.

Pilate himself wrote the title or accusation which must be posted on the cross, to justify the execution of Jesus: it was simply

"The King of the Jews."

The chief priests objected, and said to Pilate: "Write not, The King of the Jews; but that he said: I am the King of the Jews." "What I have written I have written," was Pilate's curt reply. It told of the governor's own conviction, it spoke of the Saviour's rightful authority, it preached to the chief priests their high treason against their best Friend. Even in this there was a conquering power. The last testimony of Pilate was to the justice of his claim, as his first testimony had been to his innocence. There were some then, as there are some now, whose one object is to make some gain for themselves out of all which happens. The clothing of the executed criminal was the perquisite of the soldiers, and while the Saviour hung in his dying agony, the parting of his garment was taking place beneath the cross. O how many there are who want to make a profit out of religion, something for time and sense. There are some who want to have a hand in the management of the work of God, because they like to be important; it is like the parting of the garments of Jesus, getting their own spoil regardless of his sufferings. Unable to part his seamless coat, woven, no doubt, by the grateful hands of the women which followed him, they cast lots, and so fulfilled the Scriptures, "They parted my garments among them, and upon my vesture they did cast lots."

"Now these stood by the cross of Jesus his mother, and his mother's sister, Mary, the wife of Cleopas, and Mary Magdalene." This mother had kept so many things "and pondered them in her heart," who had seen him through all his wondrous life and knew, before any other human being knew it, that he was the Son of God (Luke 1 : 35); but how far she understood his death for sinners we know not. Then there was the other Mary, and Mary Magdalene, three representatives of the weakest among the weaker sex, and yet attracted to the cross, when the disciples were standing afar off.

Those who have no credit to maintain, no unyielding opinions to give up, can afford to be seen at the cross. The world is crucified to them, and they unto the world by the cross of Jesus. (Gal. 6 : 14.) They have cast in their lot for Jesus, and they stand or fall with him. So long as we cherish some life, some hopes, some desires, some plans, some reputation of our own, we are not yet crucified to the world, the world still has something in us.

This little group was repaid for the fellowship they showed with Jesus at such an hour. One of his dying looks was upon them, one of his dying utterances was to them. Looking on his mother, and then upon the one disciple who stood with them, he said, "Woman, behold thy son;" and to John, "Behold thy mother." Two words, but such a revelation of the tenderness which filled that heart just breaking under the load of man's sin. Mary had got her portion, she had not borne the cross so deeply in her own life in vain. Jesus understood; it was enough.

The end approached, but that every Scripture might be fulfilled, he said, "I thirst." The little alleviation to be gained by the sponge filled with vinegar did not satisfy the heart which thirsted for a lost world. One more word: "It is finished." "And he bowed his head, and gave up the ghost." And now, no soul of man who believes and yields himself up to God need be lost; no power of sin need hold sway; the battle has been fought and won.

LESSON POINTS.

Especially Adapted to the Requirements of the Desk.

AND he bearing his cross went forth into a place called the place of a skull. What a sad place it must have seemed to our dear Saviour, yet oh how he has enriched and endeared it to the heart of every true believer! There is no spot on earth to which by faith we turn with greater tenderness, greater love, greater joy, greater confidence, and greater comfort than to Calvary, the refuge of every sin sick-soul.

When on Calvary I rest;
God in flesh made manifest,
Shines in my Redeemer's face
Full of beauty, truth and grace.
Here I would forever stay,
Weep and gaze my soul away;
Thou art heaven on earth to me—
Lovely, mournful Calvary.

Out in our western country, in the autumn, when men go hunting, and there has not been any rain for months, sometimes the prairie grass catches fire, and when the wind is strong the flames may be seen rolling along, twenty feet high, destroying man and beast in their onward rush. When the frontiersmen see what is coming what do they do to escape? They know they cannot run as fast as the fire can run. Not the fleetest horse can escape it. They first take a match and light the grass around them. The flames sweep onward, they take their stand in the burnt district and are safe. They hear the flames roar as they come along; they see death apparently bearing down upon them with resistless fury, but they do not fear. They do not even tremble as the ocean of flame surges around them, for over the place where they stand the fire has already passed, and there is no danger. There is nothing for the fire to burn. And there is one spot on earth that God has swept over. Eighteen hundred years ago the storm burst on Calvary, and the Son of God took it into his own bosom; and now if we take our stand by the Cross we are safe, for time and for eternity.

Now there stood by the cross of Jesus his mother and his mother's sister and Mary Magdalene. Not a Jewess was to be found among the crowd of priests and the rabble who insulted the Son of God, scourged him, crowned him with thorns, and subjected him to the infamy and the agony of the cross. Chateaubriand gives a fanciful but an agreeable reason for the fact that the Jewish women are so much handsomer than the men of their race. He says Jewesses have escaped the curse which alighted upon their fathers, husbands and sons. The women of Judæa believed in the Saviour, and assisted and soothed him under affliction.

A woman of Bethany poured on his head precious ointment, which she kept in a vase of alabaster. The sinner anointed his feet with perfumed oil, and wiped them with her hair. The daughters of Jerusalem wept over him, the holy women accompanied him to Calvary, brought him balms and spices, and weeping sought him in the sepulchre. Christ on his part extended mercy to the Jewesses. He raised from the dead the son of the widow of Nain, and Martha's brother, Lazarus. He cured Simon's mother-in-law, and the woman who touched the hem of his garment. To the Samaritan woman he was a spring of living water. His first appearance after the resurrection was to Mary Magdalene. Surely the reflection of some beautiful ray may have rested on the brows of these Jewesses.

For Christ also hath once suffered for our sins. And if we by faith accept his sufferings and the sacrifice which he in his own body made for us, forgiveness and remission of sin and life everlasting become accomplished facts.

When the woes of life o'er take me,
Hopes deceive and fears annoy;
Never shall the cross forsake me,
Lo! it glows with peace and joy.

There is an affecting passage in Roman history, which records the death of Manlius. A night and on the Capitol, fighting hand to hand, he had repelled the Gauls and saved the city when all had seemed lost. Afterward he was accused, but the Capitol towered in sight of the Forum where he was tried, and as he was about to be condemned he stretched out his hand and pointed, sadly, to the arena of his triumph. At this the people burst into tears, and the judges could not pronounce sentence. Again the trial proceeded, but was again defeated, nor could he be convicted, till they had removed him to a low spot, from which the Capitol was invisible. What the Capitol was to Manlius, the Cross of Christ is to the Christian.

The Cross! it takes our guilt away,
It holds the fainting spirit up;
It cheers with hope the gloomy day
And sweetens every bitter cup.

INNOCENT SUFFERERS.

A Story of the Sunday School Golden Text for Dec. 6. "For Christ also hath once suffered for sins." I. Peter 3 : 18.

DULL, leaden skies, rain drizzling intermittently, damp, slimy pavements and a foggy atmosphere went to make up a dull day. It was depressing even in the best streets, but it was absolutely dole-ful in those narrow thoroughfares in which aristocratic citizens and retired merchants used to live seventy years ago, but where the very poor now find cheap lodgings. Still more gloomy was it in a rear room of one of those houses where a woman sat sewing, by the light of a small oil lamp. She had fixed a piece of paper around it to form a shade, so as to get all the light she could on her work. It was only a small room, but half of it was in darkness. A voice came out of the darkness:

"Mamma, I am not asleep."

As if in answer, the woman sang softly and very sweetly a soothing hymn-tune. She had a beautiful voice which had evidently been well cultivated.

"I wish Regy would come," said the same voice plaintively when the song ceased.

"Isn't it most time, mamma?"

"He'll be here soon, darling," said the mother. "He is trying to sell all his papers before he comes, I expect."

Almost as she spoke a quick, light step was heard on the stairs and a boy about ten years old opened the door. "I'm through, mother," he said. "Did pretty well to-night," and he showed her a few nickels and pennies. Then he went over to the dark part of the room whence the voice had come and said, "Hello, Clara, you awake still? Time you were asleep long ago. I'll lie by you and sing you off." A grateful kiss could be heard and "dear Regy" before the singing began. Soon the song tapered off into a light murmur and then silence, stirred slightly by the regular breathing that announced that Clara was asleep. The boy rose carefully so as not to disturb the sleeper and treading very softly seated himself on an empty soap-box near his mother's feet.

"Going to work late to-night, mother?" he asked.

"Yes, my boy, I have a great deal to do yet."

"You were working before I got up this morning and I suppose you have been at it all day. It's hard isn't it?"

"I don't mind that Regy if we can manage to live, I'm thankful I can get work. Many poor creatures can't get it to do."

"You shan't do it when I'm a man, mother. I'll work for you. I know I can. A gentleman said to-day, I was a bright, smart boy and sure to get on. I'll push on and get a better business and then you shall have some rest, and Clara shall go to school."

"Be a good boy, Regy; always be honest and truthful and I shall be satisfied. I can work, though it is very good of you to think of working for me."

"I know what I'd like to do, mother. I'd like to take you into a restaurant and buy you a real good dinner. I went by the door of one to-night. You should just have smelled the stuff they were cooking. You ought to have had something better than bread."

"That's all you have, my boy, and I am glad you can have that."

"Oh it is enough for a strong boy like me, but I'd like to see you have a good dinner. If I only knew how, I'd get some money for that. You didn't always have to live like this did you, mother?"

"No, Regy, I used to have plenty of money and pleasure when I was a girl in the old home. Ah, that was a happy life. I wonder how the old place looks now. Just about the same I expect. It is fifteen years since I saw it. A fine old house, Regy, with beautiful gardens all around it." A tear dropped on her work as she spoke. She wiped her eyes quickly and resumed the stitching which must not be interrupted even to weep.

"You could not go back there and take us, could you, mother?"

"Oh, yes, they would be glad to have us, but what would poor Papa do?"

"He'd miss you, wouldn't he? Say, mother, what ought I to say when people ask me about him. I don't like to say he is in prison. What shall I say?"

"Are you often asked, Regy?" The tears began to fall again. The boy saw that she was distressed and he said nothing, but rose and gently and lovingly stroked the shining hair abundantly streaked with gray long before its time.

"Could you bear to tell me, mother, why they sent him to prison?"

"It is best you should know the truth, my boy. Your father is one of the best and kindest men and he had many friends. Some of them were bad men. He was fond of pleasure, and they persuaded him to join them in many things he should not. He lost his business because he did not attend to it, and he secured situations and lost them in the same way. He sank lower and lower, and at last he took what was not his own. It was found out and he was sent to prison. You were very little then, and Clara was a baby. He has been in prison a long time, and he has a long time still to stay. It has been very hard to earn money enough to keep us, but God has helped me, and he will help me through."

"What a bad man papa must be, to have made you suffer like that!"

"Do not let me ever hear you say that again, Reginald," said the mother almost fiercely. "I will not let you or any one say such a thing. No one knows how he was tempted. You must be sorry for him. He is sorry, too. He is a better man now, and when he comes out he will work for us and make up for all we have suffered."

"If he had not done wrong you would not have had to suffer," said the boy, bluntly. "That don't seem right for God to let you be miserable because papa did wrong. Why don't you go back to the home you talked of just now where you could be happy?"

"And leave him in prison? Never!" The mother looked at her son as if he were a tempter. "My staying here," she went on, "and being faithful to him is all that keeps him up and I will do it to the last. The innocent must suffer for the guilty. It is a law. Thank God it is! or how would we be saved. If Christ had not died for our sins what should we have done. Oh, if my sufferings could help my husband!" She was talking to herself now and had forgotten Regy's presence. She recalled it and continued, "Papa knows something of what we are suffering and he grieves more over that than over his own hardships. It will do him good. He will be more careful afterward. He will not forget what his wrong-doing has cost us. I am going to see him to-morrow. Now go to bed, so you may be awake early in the morning."

Two men stood watching the visitors leave the prison the next day. "Look at that woman," said one to the other. "I know her. She is a born lady. She might be living in luxury now if she chose to desert her husband and go to her father's house. She will not do it; she is killing herself with work and hardships that she may be near him. Every month on his visiting day she comes and spends the day with him. She looks thinner and older each time. I wish we could get her husband pardoned. If he is not she will not see him at liberty."

"What kind of a man is her husband?"

"Oh he was a most unmitigated knave; but guess he is a changed man now. This destruction of her's has touched him as nothing else could. If I were the Governor I would pardon him for her sake."

A BISHOP CLIMBS A SPIRE

A LITTLE over ten years ago, the spire of Christ Church Cathedral, New Zealand, was partly destroyed by an earthquake. Its restoration was immediately commenced by a family named Rhodes, who had built it originally. When the last brick was about to be laid on the top of the spire, the honor of placing it there was reserved for Bishop Julius, who ascended to the dizzy height in a chair attached to a wire rope. On reaching the top, the Bishop received a solid silver trowel with which the last brick was "well and truly laid," and then descended. The foundation stone of the Cathedral was laid by Dr. Harper, then Bishop of Christ Church, and the engraving on this page shows his successor on his way to the summit to perform the ceremony of "laying the last brick," a novel and dangerous undertaking, but one from which the courageous Prelate did not shrink and accomplished safely and successfully.

THE ROLL CALL.

THE vet'rans are coming! They come one by one; Ceased now is the drumming and bugles' sharp tone.

The trumpet is sounding full, long, loud, and dread,

Awakening all sleepers, e'en ocean's hid dead,

Each carries his banner in conflict oft scarred: With trophies of triumph, though spotted and marred.

Their Captain was Jesus, their flag was his Cross, His blood bought their armor, and cleansed them from dross.

Through an enemy's country they travelled full long,

But visions of Home often cheered them along; But now it is ended, the warfare and strife,—Now the Palm and the Crown—the beginning of life.

The heavens have parted, the White Throne appears;

The Books are now opened—the Roll Call each hears.

Back, traitors! Come children! God gathers his own—

Swing wide, Gates of Triumph, that lead to the Throne!

MENTAL WORK.

REPORTING the trial of a lawsuit in Detroit, Mich., for arrears of salary, a local journal prints a remarkable expression used by the plaintiff. The claim was made on a clergyman by a gentleman who had acted as his curate for two years. There was no documentary evidence and some doubt existed whether the services rendered were honorary or were to be paid for. The plaintiff was asked what was the nature of the services, and he replied that he did the "menial work." Requested to be more definite, he answered that by menial work he meant visiting the poor, reading and praying with the sick and attending the funerals of impoverished members of the church. "That," he said, "I consider menial work." If he is correctly reported, and if he used the word in its customary sense, it is well that his engagement has terminated. No man who has the spirit of the Master, who washed the feet of his disciples, counts services rendered to his people a menial occupation. The humblest service done for Christ's sake is honorable. (John 13: 14, 15.)

A CONFUSING BOUNDARY LINE.

RECTIFICATION of a boundary-line is being urged by a Boston journal. It says that much confusion exists among the residents of the contiguous parts of Cambridge and Somerville on account of the division of the two towns. The line that now separates them cuts across lots, runs through yards, and divides houses. Unless a person knows the neighborhood he cannot tell whether he is in Cambridge or Somerville. The owner of one house can sleep in Cambridge and eat his breakfast in Somerville, yet remain all the time under one roof. Through the front doorway he can go to business by way of Cambridge, and through the rear doorway by way of Somerville. Several owners of houses have to pay taxes in both cities because the line cuts off corners of their houses. An effort is to be made to remove these complications, either by amalgamating the towns, or by making a new boundary-line, which shall run through the middle of the streets, so that at least the residents may know to which town they belong. The same knowledge is essential in the spiritual world. Many people are not sure whether they belong to the kingdom of Christ, or the kingdom of the world. They are the people, too, who live near the boundary-line and are not openly decided for Christ. In spite of the efforts being made by such people, the two kingdoms can never be amalgamated. The only safe course for anyone in doubt is to pray and strive to get nearer to God. (11 Cor. 6: 17, 18.)

THE DEADLY QUICKSAND.

NEAR Plattsmouth, Nebraska, is an extremely dangerous road which it is safe to travel only in the summer. In the spring and fall it is especially perilous. Certain portions of it, at those seasons, become quicksand. A local journal says that all the people of the district know of the danger and avoid the road by taking a long detour over a hill. A signboard is set up at the fork of the road to warn strangers. A few days ago, a gentleman from Joplin, Missouri, who was in the neighborhood, rode along the road on horse-back. It being near nightfall he did not notice the warning board. He had ridden a long distance that day and thought he would like to walk a little, as it was a beautiful evening. He therefore dismounted and left his horse, an intelligent, docile animal which was a pet of his, to follow him. He walked for some distance, and then sat down on a bank to wait for his horse to overtake him. The animal was grazing as he came along and was not in sight. The man fell into a doze, and on awakening was alarmed to find that his feet and legs up to the knees had sunk in the sand. When he tried to withdraw them, he could not. They were firmly grasped, and he realized that he was held by quicksand. He knew the meaning of it and, throwing himself back, struggled to free himself. The only result was to sink deeper. He shouted for help, but none came. The sand drew him in up to the waist, and then he gave himself up for lost. It was getting dark, and he thought with a groan that he would never see the sun rise again. But he thought of his horse, and gave a call which it always answered. It trotted up to where he lay, and the man reached up and grasped it firmly. Then he urged him on. The pain was excruciating; it seemed as if his limbs were being torn off, but he held on, and in a minute or two the horse had drawn him on to firm ground. He lay down to recover from the terrible strain and then mounted and rode back, thankful for his narrow escape. Sometimes, the mental and spiritual agony a man has to bear before he is separated from the sinful habits which are dragging him down to perdition is as hard to bear as was this man's strain. Many shrink from it and are lost, but he who realizes his true condition clings to Christ at any cost and is delivered (Matt. 5: 29-30.)

FREE BUT DID NOT KNOW IT.

COMPENSATION for twenty-four years' service was claimed in a suit tried in a court in Kansas City, Mo., on Nov. 9. The plaintiff, a quadroon, testified that she was born in slavery in the year 1840. She lived on her owner's estate performing domestic service until the year 1887. After the war she was prohibited leaving the premises except in the company of a member of the family. She was not allowed to have any communication with people of her own race and if any came to the house she was sent on some errand to the upper stories so that she might not have any conversation with them. She could not read or write and had never heard of the emancipation proclamation. During all the time she received no compensation but that of a slave—food and clothing. When at last she learned that slavery had been abolished long ago, she left her service and sued for her wages, which, at five dollars a month, made a total of $1440. An informality in the pleadings rendered her suit a failure but she will renew it. Ignorant as the woman is, she had too much sense to remain in slavery after learning that she was free. It is much to be wished that all who are in bondage to sin and Satan would manifest similar promptitude in claiming their freedom when they hear that Christ has purchased it with his blood. (John 8: 32-36.)

BOTH NEGLIGENT.

AMONG the anecdotes of James Russell Lowell which have come to light since his death, is one that he used to tell against himself. It appears that when a young man he spent a summer vacation in the White Mountain district. In the course of a walk through the Franconia Notch he made the acquaintance of a man who was attending to a saw-mill. The man kept on feeding the teeth of the mill with logs as he talked to the visitor. Lowell asked him which was the best point of view for the Old Man of the Mountain. "Dunno," said the man, "never seed it." Lowell expressed his amazement that any one living so near such a marvellous spectacle, which people came from long distances to see, should never have cared to gaze upon it. How far had he come, the man asked. Lowell told him with some pride that he was from Boston. "Du tell," exclaimed the man. "I'd like to see Bawston. I'd like to stand once on Bunker Hill. You been there often likely?" Lowell had to admit that he had never been there. "Law!" exclaimed the man, "You live in Bawston and never been to Bunker Hill. Well!" His astonishment was as great as Lowell's had been, and both realized, as the sawyer said, that "what a man can see any day he never does see." Unhappily the same characteristic of the human mind often operates to the loss of the soul. People who have been familiar with the Gospel from childhood, to whom the offer of salvation is made every week are often those who put off accepting it until it is too late. (1 Timothy 4: 7.)

CONGRATULATIONS FOR CHRISTIANS.

IT is with some half-past five in the morning and some faint streaks of light. With others, it is seven o'clock and thus full dawn. With others, it is twelve o'clock at noon, and you sit in the full blaze of Gospel pardon. I bring you congratulation. Joseph delivered from Potiphar's dungeon, Daniel lifted from the lion's den, Saul arrested and unhorsed on the road to Damascus. Oh! you delivered captives, how your eyes should gleam, and your souls should bound, and your lips should sing in this pardon. From what land did you come? A land of darkness. What is to be your destiny? A land of light. Who got you out? Christ, the Lord. Can you be so placid and unmoved while all heaven comes to your soul with congratulation, and harps are strung, and crowns are lifted, and a great joy swings round the heaven at the news of your disenthralment? If you could realize out of what a pit you have been dug, to what height you are to be raised, and to what glory you are destined, you would spring to your feet with "Hosanna."

In 1808, there was a meeting of the emperors of France and Russia at Erfurt. There were distinguished men there also from other lands. It was so arranged that when any of the emperors arrived at the door of the reception-room, the drum should beat three times; but when a lesser dignitary should come, then the drum would sound but twice. After a while, the people in the audience-chamber heard two taps of the drum. They said: "a prince is coming." But after a while there were three taps, and they cried: "The emperor!" Oh! there is a more glorious arrival at your soul. The drum beats twice at the coming in of the lesser joys and congratulation of your soul; but it beats once, twice, thrice at the coming in of a glorious King, Jesus the Saviour, Jesus the God. I congratulate you. All are yours—things present and things to come.

WATERED GARDENS.

WE have by this severe autumnal drought been reminded how much we are dependent upon God for rain. No garden could prosper long without plenty of water. I have seen a garden in the midst of a desert, yet blooming and luxuriant. All around was dearth and barrenness; but there were pipes, aqueducts reaching from this garden up to the mountains, and through these aqueducts the water came streaming down and tossing up into beautiful fountains, until every root and leaf and flower was saturated. That is like the Church. The Church is a garden in the midst of a great desert of sin and suffering; but it is well irrigated, for "our eyes are unto the hills from whence cometh our help." From the mountains of God's strength there flow down rivers of gladness. There is a river, the stream thereof shall make glad the city of our God. Preaching the Gospel is one of these aqueducts. The Bible is another. Baptism and the Lord's Supper are aqueducts. Water to slake the thirst, water to restore the faint, water to wash the unclean, water tossed high up in the light of the sun of righteousness, showing us the rainbow around the throne. Oh! was there ever a garden so thoroughly irrigated? You know that the beauty of Versailles and Chatsworth depends very much upon the great supply of water. I came to the latter place (Chatsworth) one day when strangers are not to be admitted; but by an inducement, which always seemed as applicable to an Englishman as to an American, I got in, and then the gardener, went far up above the stairs of stone and turned on the water. I saw it gleaming on the dry pavement, coming down from step to step until it came so near I could hear the musical rush, and all over the high, broad stairs it came foaming, flashing, roaring down, until sunlight and wave in glee-some wrattle, tumbled at my feet. So it is with the Church of God. Everything comes from above; pardon from above, joy from above, adoption from above, sanctification from above. Oh! that now God would turn on the waters of salvation, and that in all our churches we might find "Elim, with twelve wells of water, and three-score and ten palm-trees."

SECRET PRAYER.

THERE is one great secret of advancement in religious experience, and that is secret prayer. It is very easy to come into a public assemblage, and stimulated by the hearty singing and by the cheerful faces of scores and hundreds of God's people, to bow our head and lift up our hearts in prayer; but to have some secret place where, day by day, either at morning, or at noon, or at night, we kneel down before God, no one in the whole world listening, and to do that thing day after day, and month after month, and year after year, and for scores of years,—that is not so easy a thing to do. It wants some perseverance, some high appreciation of duty, some grand Christian determination, some Almighty help.

SUNDAY PLEASURES.

GOD says, in Isaiah: "If thou turn away thy foot from doing thy pleasure on my holy day, thou shalt walk upon the high places." What did he mean by "doing thy pleasure?" He referred to secular and worldly amusements. A man told me he was never so much frightened as in the midst of an earthquake, when the beasts of the field bellowed in fear, and even the barn-yard fowls screamed in terror. Well, it was when the earth was shaking and the sky was all full of fire that God made the great announcement: "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy." Go along through the streets where the theatres are open on a Sabbath night; go up on the steps; enter the boxes of those places of entertainment, and tell me if that is keeping the Sabbath holy. "O," says some one, "God won't be displeased with a grand sacred concert." A gentleman who was present at a "grand sacred concert" one Sabbath night in one of the theatres of our great cities, said that during the exercises there were comic and sentimental songs, interspersed with coarse jokes; and there were dances, and a farce, and tight-rope walking, and a trapeze performance. I suppose it was a holy dance and a consecrated tightrope. I am not certain, however, about that; but this I know, it was a "grand sacred concert." We hear a great deal of talk about "the rights of the people" to have just such amusements on Sunday as they want to have. I wonder if the Lord has any rights. You rule your family, the Governor rules the State, the President rules the whole land; I wonder if the Lord has a right to rule the nations and make the enactment, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy," and if there is any appeal to a higher court from that decision, and if the men who are warring against that enactment are not guilty of high treason against the Maker of heaven and earth. They have in our cities put God on trial. It has been the theatres and opera-houses of the land, plaintiffs, versus the Lord Almighty, defendant, and the suit has begun, and who shall come out ahead, you know. We have just such rights as God gives us. He has never given the right to man to break his holy Sabbath, and as long as his throne stands he never will give that right.

IMPORTANCE OF TYPE.

WE try to present what we have to say in good plain type. Every few years there goes through China the ophthalmia, a disease of the eye which leaves thousands of people in partial or total blindness. Small print is doing the same work in this country. There are type-founders blasting the eyesight of the people. There are publishers who pride themselves on the number of words they can get within a square inch, and under the process we are suffering a great national ophthalmia. Better not read at all than kill your eyes with poor print. God gives us only two organs of sight, and the penalty of trifling with them is life-long twilight or midnight of vision. There is consequently a great rush upon opticians for spectacles. Girls and boys of fifteen at school must have their eye-glass astride the nose. There was a fearful sarcasm in the action of the man who used to come on the railway train at Albany with spectacles for sale, as much as to say, "with those fine-print books and newspapers you have been slaying your eyes all the way from Buffalo; I come in as an optical undertaker, just to try on you this coffin of spectacles." Young men and maidens, nothing you can hang on the bridge of your nose in the way of eye-glasses can give you such dignity or grace as a clear eye, blue or black or hazel, unharmed by dissipation, unextinguished by the type-setters. Authors and publishers are often chagrined at the blunders of the printing-press. A Frenchman, having counted three hundred typographical errors in his favorite book, gave up the ghost, and got out of the world as soon as he could. We wonder that a similar departure was not witnessed when one of our popular magazines was, by mistake of the printer-boy, called "The Epileptic Review." But the worst of all typographical errors is that of small type. Let publishers not forget the failing sight of the old. As age comes on, father and mother cannot go out as much as they used to, and are more dependent upon reading for entertainment. Put not before their diminished sight typography that blurs and confounds them. In plain print tell them the news of the world out of which they go, and the news of the world which they are about to enter. Let the hymn-book, and the Bible, and the religious newspaper be in distinct letter-press. The poorest compliment ever paid to the Lord's Prayer was the cutting it in small letters on a five-cent piece. It is a hard thing for an octogenarian to "read his title clear" in blurred type. It is a grand thing to have a page so plain that old age can read it either with or without spectacles. Mother had two pairs—her "near-sighted" spectacles and her

"far-sighted" ones. She wore them both at once—one upon the forehead, the other on the nose, the distance of the object deciding which pair she would use. But one day she took off the "far-sighted" spectacles with which she had often looked toward heaven, and put on the "near-sighted" ones; it was just as she went into the Gate.

BRIEF NOTES.

Our readers will be glad to learn that Rev. C. H. Yatman, the eminent and successful Evangelist, has undertaken to write a series of articles for this journal giving helpful hints to soul-winners. The first of these articles appears this week on page 745. No man is better qualified than Mr. Yatman to give advice on this subject, as he has had a long and wide experience in the work, and God has richly blessed his labors.

The Non-Partisan Women's Christian Temperance Union has been holding its annual meeting in Brooklyn, N. Y. Its final session was held on Nov. 13 in Association Hall. Reports were read from various districts showing the progress of the work.

The Protestant Episcopal Congress held its Fourteenth session in Washington, D. C., last week. It opened November 17th, and sat for four days. Ex-Senator George F. Edmunds presided at the first session. The Congress discussed various subjects of momentous interest to the church.

Rev. John L. Scudder, pastor of the People's Tabernacle, in Jersey City, finds that the estimates for the portion now complete of the People's Palace have been exceeded, owing to unforeseen circumstances. He is in debt to the extent of nearly a thousand dollars. He, therefore, asks the help of Christians in sympathy with the philanthropic work he is doing.

Rev. C. H. Yatman has had wonderful success in his meetings at Scranton, Pa. The closing services were held on November 22, in the Tabernacle Methodist Episcopal Church. They commenced in the early morning and continued all day. The jubilee service at 10:30 A. M., when the converts were received into Church fellowship will never be forgotten by any who witnessed it.

The Congregational Club of Chicago has adopted a series of resolutions expressing its belief that the United States Senate ought to ratify the Brussels Treaty for the suppression of the slave trade and the traffic in intoxicating liquor in Africa, which has been ratified by all the seventeen governments represented except the two Republics of France and the United States. The Club also urges other religious bodies to give formal expression to their opinion, in the hope that the Senators may realize that in withholding ratification they are antagonizing the wishes of the religious public.

Dr. L. W. Munhall concluded his three weeks' services at Beatrice, Nebraska, on November 13. They have been marvellously successful. The Beatrice Daily Express says, that there have been over three hundred conversions during the meetings, and adds: "No such movement has ever been aroused in the city before. The heartfelt thanks and good wishes of the citizens will follow the Evangelist wherever he may go." Some of the conversions have been of men previously active in their opposition to religion in any form. Dr. Munhall is now laboring at Grand Island and hopes to go thence to Wisconsin.

Mrs. Sophie B. McNeal, who has been laboring in self-supporting work for Christ in Lucknow and other cities of India during the past five years, has now returned to the United States and is delivering lectures on the evils which are hindering the progress of the Gospel in that land, especially the new and alarming increase in intemperance and the use of opium. The information she has to impart having been gained by personal investigation is especially valuable to churches interested in missionary work. Her address is 196 Osborne Street, Cleveland, Ohio.

The World's Women's Christian Temperance Union opened its annual convention in Boston, Mass., on Nov. 13. Three thousand delegates were present representing every State and Territory in the Union. The meetings were held in Tremont Temple, but it was necessary to hold overflow meetings in Park Street Church and Bromfield Street Church, which were both crowded to their utmost capacity. The Union has grown prodigiously during the year, and has largely extended its work. Its receipts for the year were $25,259. The size and spirit of the meetings proved that the ardor and energy of this mighty agency for moral reformation is undiminished, and that its power has not been impaired by the secession of some of its members who separated from it on political grounds.

RECORD OF THE WEEK.

Our Commander in Chilian Waters—Brazil's Revolution—Bishop Merrill Ill—A Vast Russian Conspiracy—The World's Crops—Is Drinking Increasing?

RUMORS of a renewal of our diplomatic trouble with Italy over the New Orleans affair, are current at the National Capital. The Hon. A. G. Porter, our Minister to Rome, has returned unexpectedly, and this gave rise to the report that Italy had sent an ultimatum, seizing the opportunity when our government was embarrassed by the Chilian affair and our navy absent beyond immediate recall. An unofficial explanation is that Minister Porter has been granted leave of absence at his own request, but it is significantly added that he will remain away from his post until the Italian Premier, Rudini, makes some friendly advances that would justify his return. This, in effect, might mean the severance of diplomatic relations between the two countries. The Italia, a leading Roman paper, asserts that it has information that the United States government has recognized the responsibility for the New Orleans lynching affair and is prepared to pay indemnity to the relatives of those Italian citizens who lost their lives through the violence of the New Orleans mob. No confirmation of this statement has come from Washington.

Our Navy and Chili.

THE naval squadron destined for service in Chilian waters, in the event of our trouble with that government terminating in hostilities, is now all ready for duty. A number of the vessels sailed under sealed orders sometime ago, and the balance of the squadron awaits final instructions from the Navy Department. Rear Admiral Gherardi, who will command the entire squadron, is an officer of life-long experience and tried reputation, who may be depended on to prove equal to any emergency that may arise requiring decided action. His portrait is given in this column. On the Admiral's arrival at the point where the squadron will rendezvous, Admiral Brown will place himself and his vessels under Admiral Gherardi's orders. New complications have arisen in Chili's domestic affairs in consequence of the resignation of certain members of the Cabinet, and there is strong political antagonism and discontent which for the time overshadow the trouble with this country. President Montt and his friends are doing all they can to restore harmony. Balmaceda's former Minister of Agriculture, Gandorillas, has committed suicide, dreading punishment by the new government, and ten Balmacedist officers have been sentenced to banishment from the country. President Harrison has formally received Senor Pedro Montt as Chili's diplomatic representative, and an exchange of courtesies and assurances of good will has taken place, which augurs well for a friendly solution of these present difficulties.

Balmaceda's Crowning Crime.

If nothing else were chargeable against Balmaceda, the late Dictator of Chili, who died by his own hand, the horrible butchery of over one hundred young men, belonging to the leading families of Santiago, which took place by his orders at Lo Canas, in August last, is enough to stamp him as a modern Nero, undeserving of pity in his misfortunes. The details of the tragedy have just come to light. About one hundred and fifty young Santiaguans agreed to form themselves into a body to assist the Congressional Army on its arrival at Valparaiso. On August 17 they met by appointment at the Lo Canas estate, belonging to Don Carlos Walker Martinez, and situated about ten miles from Santiago, their purpose being to rouse the populace in the capital against the Dictator the moment Balmaceda's troops were withdrawn to fight the Congress army. There was a traitor in the band, and at daybreak on the 18th, the rendezvous was surrounded by government troops. Several of the young Constitutionalists succeeded in effecting their escape by bribing Balmaceda's officers, but the others were ruthlessly massacred, their bodies mutilated and treated with a barbarity that would shock even the wildest savages. The outrage has stirred up Chilians greatly, and the government is determined to bring to justice all concerned in the massacre.

Brazil's Rebellion.

WHILE it is more than probable that Brazil will emerge from its present troubles, an unimpaired member of the great sisterhood of Southern Republics, there are many who indulge hopes of a different character. As is well known, the exiled Dom Pedro has never abandoned his ambition of being restored to the throne he suddenly abdicated a year ago, and his adherents have not ceased to make propaganda wherever possible to that end. The Dom has no son, and his haughty daughter Isabelle, and her husband Comte d'Eu, were none too popular with the Brazilian people; but he has other relatives who belong to the throne-hunting Bourbon family and who would eagerly welcome a stroke of fortune that brought the Brazilian throne under their control. Prince Augusto de Bourbon, the favorite grandson of Dom Pedro, has been mentioned in recent despatches as about to arrive in Rio Janeiro, presumably to forward the imperial interests. He is the eldest son of Dom Pedro's daughter, Leopoldine, who married Prince August of Saxe-Coburg in 1867, and he is nine years older than the son of the Princess Isabelle, Dom Pedro's eldest daughter. Educated under the personal supervision of Dom Pedro, he was for years regarded in Brazil as the heir presumptive. Even now, although Isabelle's son stands between him and the throne in the line of legitimate succession, he would, in the event of a restoration, be more likely to be called than a descendant of the woman who, with her intriguing husband, the Comte d'Eu, was largely the cause of precipitating the troubles that brought about the Empire's final overthrow. A portrait of Prince Pedro Augusto is given on this page. The province of Rio Grande do Sul revolted against Fonseca, and a skirmish has occurred between the Dictator's troops and the rebels. Fonseca will take the field in person. Forty thousand revolutionists are said to be marching on Port Alegre, and several naval vessels have joined the revolt. The Governor of the Province has resigned and affairs are now conducted by a provisional government. A decisive battle is expected shortly.

Is Drinking on the Increase?

SOME very significant facts are set forth in the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, just issued, which may well furnish food for reflection to thoughtful Americans. In a single group of statistics, there is contained more material for temperance advocates than could be secured in a lifetime of personal observation. While the amount of taxes collected from tobacco showed a decrease of a million dollars since last year, that collected on spirits was over $83,000,000—the largest ever recorded and considerably in excess of 1890. During the year, 693 stills, most of them illicit, were destroyed and 378 persons arrested. The total number of distilleries operated is now 4,049 and the total product of spirits for the year was nearly 115,000,000 gallons, or about 7,000,000 more than in 1890. The quantity held in warehouse on June 30 was 113,000,000 gallons—the largest stock ever registered. And this is entirely outside of the vast amount of unregistered and illicit stuff which is put on the market in defiance of the law. At the present time, the wholesale liquor dealers have on hand in the neighborhood of fourteen million gallons and the retailers about fifty-two million gallons. This enormous national reservoir of whiskey is without a parallel in any country in the world in proportion to population, except Great Britain. Distributed among our population it would allow nearly two gallons of spirits for every man, woman, and child in the Union.

A New Russian Conspiracy.

SIXTY members of the Russian nobility and a number of persons belonging to the upper and middle classes have been arrested in Moscow, charged with a conspiracy against the imperial government. The ramifications of the plot are said to extend throughout the whole Empire, and the object, unlike most Russian conspiracies, was not to take the Czar's life, but to secure the creation of a representative assembly. This has long been a dream of many Russians of the better class. Naturally, so many arrests have caused tremendous excitement in St. Petersburg. The police first found traces in that city of the new movement, and soon learned that its headquarters were in Moscow. A feeling of uneasiness exists over the whole empire and the marshals of the nobility have been warned that they will be held responsible for any demonstrations against the government that may be attempted in the different provinces. Students at the different schools and universities are under special surveillance. Meanwhile the situation is rendered more critical by the troubles in the famine districts, where the peasants, driven to desperation by hunger, are committing acts of lawlessness which the police seem powerless to prevent.

The Crops of the World.

A LEADING American statistician has just completed an estimate of the world's crop of wheat and rye, which makes a most gratifying showing for this favored land. Our wheat crop is placed at 600,000,000 bushels, of which 265,000,000 are exports; Canada's wheat crop is estimated at 45,000,000; exports 15,000,000; Great Britain's crop will not exceed 68,000,000 bushels, of which 4,000,000 will be of a quality so poor as to be unfit for bread. The United Kingdom requires 232,000,000 bushels of wheat, indicating an import of 168,000,000 bushels, to which should be added 1,800,000 bushels of rye. France's wheat crop will be about 232,000,000 bushels—a shortage of 110,000,000 bushels, and her rye is 10,000,000 bushels below the average. Italy has 124,000,000 bushels of wheat, indicating an import of 28,000,000 bushels, while Germany's wheat is 18 per cent. below an average, and rye 20 per cent. below, indicating an import of probably 114,000,000 bushels of both grains. In Austro-Hungary, Switzerland, Spain, Portugal and Holland, the crops are also estimated as below average. Altogether, the apparent deficits in the crops of foreign countries will approximate 455,000,000 bushels of wheat and 335,000,000 rye, while the surplus of exporting countries is 377,000,000 wheat and 30,000,000 rye, leaving the whole crop-raising world short 78,000,000 bushels of wheat and 305,000,000 rye. As we hold the bulk of the surplus, it is very evident that the United States of America will be largely the means of feeding the world this year.

Ex-King Milan's Renunciation.

THAT eccentric European potentate, Ex-King Milan, has signed a renunciation of his legal and constitutional rights in Serbia, his former kingdom. This effectually removes him from the field of European politics where he has for years been an uncertain and troublesome quantity. The story of his quarrel with Queen Natalie his abdication of the throne in favor of Prince Alexander, his son, in March 1880, and the subsequent dissensions of the ex-King and queen have already been referred to in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Milan was born in 1854 and succeeded to the throne in 1868, after the assassination of his uncle Prince Michail Obrenovitch, by a band of conspirators. In 1875, Milan married Natalie Keschko, the daughter of a Russian military officer of the Imperial Guard, and Prince Alexander, the present king of Serbia was born Aug. 17, 1876. In 1885, Milan invaded Bulgaria with an army, under the pretext that that country had violated the treaty of Berlin by annexing Eastern Roumelia. After a brief campaign, in which Milan demonstrated his cowardice, the Servians were defeated. Milan divorced his Queen in 1888, and the latter sent a protest against the divorce to every court in Europe, declaring it illegal, but it was never revoked. For several years past, Milan has spent the greater part of his time in Paris. A portrait of the young King Alexander is given above.

Bishop Merrill's Illness.

FROM Chicago come the intelligence that Bishop Stephen M. Merrill, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, is dangerously ill. Bishop Merrill has won a distinguished reputation as an authority on ecclesiastical law, and is a conspicuous and influential member of the Bench of Bishops. He was born in Ohio in 1825, entered the ministry in 1846 and, in 1866, was made editor of the Western Christian Advocate. He is a devoted Christian, a strong and brilliant polemical writer and has produced several books that have attracted wide attention. He is, moreover, a fine parliamentarian, and with his broad spirituality and thorough knowledge of ecclesiastical law, has frequently presided in General Conference in very trying debates. His demise would occasion a serious loss to the Methodist Church in this country. A portrait of Bishop Merrill is given above.

NEWS NOTES.

San Salvador is the latest applicant for reciprocity with this country.

New York has narrowly escaped a water famine owing to the prolonged drought.

The Argentine Radicals have assured President Pellegrini that no revolution will be attempted.

Belgian capitalists have subscribed $3,000,000 for building a railroad through Mashonaland, Southeast Africa.

Seventy-seven persons were drowned in the Bay of Bengal, during a cyclone which swept the Andaman Islands.

A blizzard visited Minnesota, last week, and there were heavy snowstorms in Iowa, North Dakota, Colorado, and adjoining States.

P. W. McNally, an Irish patriot, died last week in Dublin, and his funeral was the occasion of a monster demonstration, second in size only to that of Parnell.

Fifty miners narrowly escaped death in the Leggett's Creek Coal Mine near Scranton, Pa., a few days ago, owing to the sudden flooding of the mine.

The entire family of Charles Bethers, of Columbus, O., was burned to death by a tenement fire last week, including father, mother and three children.

Col. Donn Piatt died at his home, Mac-o-chee, Ohio, last week of the grip. He was a noted political and general author, had been editor of several papers, and was a famous correspondent during the Civil War.

The Mexican rebels have sustained a defeat under Catarino Garcia at Guerrero, on the Rio Grande, and a quantity of their ammunition has been captured by the government troops under Col. Ceron.

Comanche, the war-horse who was the sole survivor of the Custer massacre, died at Fort Riley, Kan., a week ago of old age. He was one of the original mount of Custer's famous Seventh Cavalry, and had been in almost every battle with the Indians during a dozen years.

Governor Buchanan of Tennessee is in correspondence with the War Department in relation to the rebellious miners in that state. He finds himself unable with the aid of State troops to control the 6,000 armed miners who might at any moment be reinforced by 20,000 others from adjoining states.

ADMIRAL GHERARDI.

KING ALEXANDER I.

UNDER ORDERS.

"He that made me whole, the same said unto me, Take up thy bed and walk."—John 5: 11.

JUST a few observations upon the narrative itself. It was a feast day, and Jesus Christ came up to Jerusalem to find opportunities for doing good among the crowds of his countrymen. I see all the city glad; I hear the voice of rejoicing in every house as they hold high festival and eat the fat and drink the sweet. But where does Jesus keep the feast? How does he spend his holiday? He walks among the poor, whom he loves so well. Behold him in the hospital. There was one notable Bethesda or house of mercy in Jerusalem: it was a poor provision for the city's abounding sickness, but such as it was it was greatly prized.

Our Lord was at Home

amid this misery, for here was room for his tender heart and powerful hand. He feasted his soul by doing good. Let us learn this lesson, dear friends, that in the times of our brightest joys we should remember the sorrowful, and find a still higher joy in doing them good. Blessed shall they be who, like the Lord Jesus, visit the sick and care for them.

Coming into the hospital our Lord noticed a certain man whose case was a very sad one. There were many painful cases there, but he singled out this man, and it would seem that the reason for his choice was that the poor creature was in the worst plight of all. If misery has a claim on pity, then the greater the sufferer the more is mercy attracted towards him. This poor victim of rheumatism or paralysis had been thirty-eight years bound by his infirmity. Our Lord selects the worst case to be dealt with by his curing hand, as a type of what he often does in the kingdom of grace, and as a lesson of prudence to us, instructing us to give our first aid to those who are first in point of need.

Help for the Unworthy.

The man whom Jesus healed was by no means an attractive character. Our Saviour said to him when he was healed, "Sin no more, lest a worst thing come unto thee," from which it is not an improbable inference that his first infirmity had come upon him by some deed of vice or course of excess. In some way or other he had been guilty of that which brought upon his body the suffering which he was then enduring. Now, it is considered generally to be a point beyond all dispute that we should help the worthy but should refuse the worthless,—that when a man brings a calamity upon himself by wrong-doing we are justified in letting him suffer, that he may reap what he has sown. Now, I venture to say that our Saviour never taught us to confine our alms to the deserving. He would never have bestowed the grand alms of grace on any one of us if he had carried out that rule; and if you and I had received no more at the hands of God than we deserved, we should not have been in this house of prayer.

In addition to the supposition that this man had at some time been grossly guilty, it seems pretty clear from the text that he was a poor, shiftless, discouraged, inanimate, stupid sort of body. He had never managed to get into the pool, though others had done so who were as infirm as himself. He had never been able to win a friend or secure a helper, though from the extreme length of his infirmity one would have thought that at some period or another he might have found a man to place him in the pool when the angel gave it the mystic stir. The Saviour's asking him, "Wilt thou be made whole?" leads us to think that he had fallen into such a listless, despairing, heart-sick condition, that though he came daily to the edge of the pool as he had not only ceased to hope, but had almost ceased to wish. Our Lord touched the chord which was likely to respond, namely, his will and desire to be made whole, but the response was a very feeble one. This poor man evinced none of the shrewdness of the man born blind, who answered the Pharisees so keenly; he was of quite another type, and could do no more than state his own case to Jesus. Thank God, even that was enough for our Lord to work with. The Lord Jesus saves people of all sorts. So here he chose this poor simpleton of a creature and wrought a great marvel upon him, to the exceeding praise of his condescending grace.

As for the cavilling Pharisees, you observe that they took no notice of the glorious fact of the man's cure; they wilfully ignored what Christ had done, but they fell full swoon upon that little, insignificant circumstance that it had been done on the Sabbath day, and then they concentrated all their thoughts and emotions upon that side issue. They say nothing of the man's being restored, but they rage because he carried his bed on the Sabbath day. It is much the same with the men of the world. The fact that Christianity is doing marvels in the world, such as nothing else ever did, they persistently forget, but that fact is what you and I must as persistently remember. This poor man did so. He did not much else, but that he had been made whole he did know, and from that fact he justified himself in what he had done. "He that made me whole, the same said, take up thy bed and walk."

I. First, then, this is our justification for what we do when we obey Christ. This poor man of taking up his bed and walking, for his enemies were learned in the law and he was not. You and I could defend it very easily, for it seems to us a very proper thing to do under the circumstances. The weight of his bed was not much more than that of an ordinary great coat it was a simple rug or mat upon which he was lying; there really was no violation of God's law of the Sabbath, and therefore there was nothing to excuse. But the Rabbis laid down rules of which I will give you but one specimen—"It is unlawful to carry a handkerchief loose in the pocket;" but if you pin it to your pocket or tie it round your waist as a girdle you may carry it anywhere, because it becomes a part of your dress. To my unsophisticated mind it would have seemed that the pin increased the ponderous burden, and that so there was the weight of the pin more than was necessary! This was quite a weighty business according to Rabbinical estimates. The most of the Rabbinical regulations with regard to the Sabbath were absolutely ludicrous, but this poor man was not in a position to say so or even to think so, for, like the rest of his countrymen, he stood in awe of the scribes and doctors. These learned Pharisees and priests were too much revered for this poor creature to answer them in their own manner; but he did what you and I must always do when we are at all puzzled;—he hid behind the Lord Jesus, and pleaded, "He that made me whole, the same said unto me, take up thy bed." That was quite enough for him, and he quoted it as if he felt that it

Could Not Defend the Action

Ought to be Enough for Them.

There are certain ordinances to which a Christian man is bound to attend, about which the world raises a storm of questions. The world does not take notice that this man was once a drunkard and has through divine grace become sober, and so has become a good father, and a good husband, and a good citizen. It lets that miracle pass by unheeded, but he is going to be baptized, and they at once object to the ordinance, or he is going to join a Christian church, and straightway they jeer at him as a Presbyterian, or a Methodist, as if it matters what sort of name they give him so long as he is a better man than themselves, and is redeemed from sin, and taught to be upright, and chaste, and pure in the sight of God. If we go to the communion table, and revilers say, "What is the use of eating a piece of bread and drinking a drop of wine? Why think so solemnly of so small a matter?" We reply, he that made us whole, the same said, "Do this in remembrance of me." We abjure what he has not ordained, but we cling to his statutes. If he had still more trivial, or a ceremony still more open to objection in the eyes of carnal man, we would make no further apology than this:—He who has created us anew, and given us a hope of heaven, and led us to seek after perfect holiness—he has bidden us do it. This is our final reply, and although we could find other justifications they would be superfluous. Stand that for our defence—the Saviour commands.

The same apology applies to all the doctrines of the gospel. I say again, ungodly men will not admit, or if they admit it they ignore it, that the gospel works a marvellous change in men's hearts. If they want proof we can find them instances by hundreds, and by thousands, of the reclaiming, elevating, and purifying power of the gospel of Jesus Christ. The gospel is daily working spiritual miracles, but this they forget, and they go on to find fault with its peculiar doctrines. Justification by faith they frequently quarrel with. "Well now," they say, "that is a shocking doctrine: if you teach men that they are to be saved by faith alone, and not by their works, of course they will lead loose lives; if you continually declare that salvation is of grace alone, and not of merit, the inevitable result will be that men will sin that grace may abound."

A Complete Answer

to this calumny is that believers in justification by faith and in the doctrines of grace are among the best and purest of men, and that as a fact these truths work holiness; but we do not care to argue thus; we prefer to remind our adversaries that he who has caused us to be regenerate men himself taught us that whosoever believeth in him shall be saved, and declared that he that believeth in him hath everlasting life.

The same applies also to all the precepts which the Christian is called upon to obey. For instance, if he is true to his colors, he keeps himself aloof from all the sinful pleasures, practices, and policies of the world, in which others take delight, and consequently the ungodly world says that he is singular, precise, and self-opinionated. This is the answer for all Christians—"He that made us whole, the same said to us, ye are not of the world, even as I am not of the world. Come ye out from among them and be ye separate, touch not the unclean thing, and I will receive you." If you follow the precepts of the Lord Jesus Christ you may meet all charges of singularity by urging the supremacy of the Saviour, whose power has made you a new creature. Where his word is, there is a power to which we bow at once.

II. And now, secondly, the cure brought an obligation.

"He that made me whole, the same said unto me, Take up thy bed, and walk." The argument takes this form: first, if he made me whole he is divine, or he could not do this miracle; or, to say the least, he must be divinely authorized; and if he be divine, or divinely authorized, I must be bound to obey the orders which he issues. Is not that a plain argument which even the poor, simple mind of the paralytic man was able to grasp and wield? Let us try and feel the force of that argument ourselves. Jesus who has saved us is our God; shall we not obey him? Since he is clothed with divine power, and majesty, shall we not scrupulously endeavor to know his will, and zealously endeavor to carry it out in every point, as his spirit shall enable us?

In addition to the divine character which the miracle proved and displayed, there was the goodness which shone in the deed of power and touched the poor man's heart. His argument was—"I must do what my great Deliverer bids me. How can you think otherwise? Did he not make me whole? Would you have me, whom he has thus graciously restored, refuse to fulfill his desire? Must I not take up my bed the moment he gives me strength to do it? How can I do otherwise? Is this to be a recompense I pay to my good Physician, at once to refuse

To do what He asks of Me?

Do you not see that I am under an obligation which it would be shameful to deny? He restores these limbs, and I am bound to do with them what he orders me to do with them." There was no answering such reasoning. Whatever might have been the claim of Jesus upon others, he clearly had an indisputable right to the loyal obedience of one whom he had made perfectly whole.

Follow me briefly in this, brothers and sisters. If you have been saved by the grace of God, your salvation has put you under obligation henceforth to do what Jesus bids you. "The Lord has been pleased to put away your sin, you are forgiven: but does not pardon demand amendment? Shall we go back to the old sins from which we have been cleansed? Shall we live in the iniquities from which we have been washed by the blood of our Lord Jesus? That were horrible to think of. It would be nothing less than devilish for a man to say, 'I have been forgiven, and therefore I will sin again.' There is no remission where there is no repentance. The guilt of sin remains on that man in whom the love of sin still remains. Let us practically feel the force of this, and follow after purity and righteousness henceforth.

III. Enough, however, upon that; for now we call your attention, in the third place, to the text under

The Sense of Constraint.

"He that made me whole, the same said unto me, take up thy bed and walk." He made him whole by saying, "Rise, take up thy bed." Oh it must have been a wondrous joy to the long enervated, nerveless, powerless frame to be capable of healthy motion, to be equal to bearing a heavy burden. The joyful man rolled up his bed, threw it on his back, and marched abroad with the best of them. The bed-carrying was part of the cure, and proof of the cure. The paralytic man had not been called upon to deliberate as to whether he should rise or not, but Jesus said, "Rise," and he stood upright: the same word said, "Take up thy bed," the bed was up at once, and according to the last word "walk," the man walked with delight. It was all done by the power of the one thrilling sentence, which

Tarried not to be Questioned, but accomplished the purpose for which the Lord had sent it. Not unwillingly did the restored man carry his bed, yet he did it of constraint, for the same power which made him whole made him obedient. What I want you to feel is this—"I cannot help obeying Christ, for by his Holy Spirit he has spoken me into a life which will never die."

Brethren, look at this, and be instructed and warned, Do you feel reluctant this morning to enter upon your Lord's service, because of conscious weakness? Has the devil tempted you to draw back from obedience, because of your unfitness? Do you hesitate? do you tremble? Surely you need to draw near to the Lord again, and hear his voice anew. Take your Bible and let him speak to you again out of the word, and may the same thrill which awoke you out of your death sleep wake you out of your present lethargy. There is need that the living word of God should come home to your inmost soul again with the same miraculous power which dwelt in it at first. "Lord, quicken thou me," is David's Prayer, but it suits me every moment, and I think the most of God's people would do well to use it daily. "Lord, speak life unto me now as thou didst at first. Speak power, speak spiritual force into me." "The love of Christ constraineth us," says the apostle; this constraint is what we want to feel more and more.

My last word is a practical lesson. The church of God on earth at this present time anxiously desires to spread her influence over the world. For Christ's sake we wish to have the truths we preach acknowledged, and the precepts which we deliver obeyed. But mark, no church will ever have power over the masses of this or any other land, except in proportion as she does them good. "Look at what we were," is a vain appeal: men only care for what we are. The sect which glorifies itself with the faded laurels of past centuries, and is content to be inactive to-day, is near to its inglorious end. The history of a congregation or a sect is of small account compared with the practical good which it is doing. Now, if any church under heaven can show that it is making men honest, temperate, pure, moral, holy, that it is seeking out the ignorant and instructing them, that it is seeking out the fallen and reclaiming them, that in fact it is turning moral Wastes into Gardens, and taking the weeds and briars of the wilderness and transforming them into precious fruit-bearing trees, then the world will be ready to hear its claims and consider them. If a church cannot prove its usefulness the source of its moral strength will have gone too; and, indeed, something worse than this will have happened, for its spiritual strength will have gone too; for a barren church is manifestly without the fruitful Spirit of God.

Oh, that the church of God would believe in Jesus' power to heal sick souls. Recollect this man, thirty-eight years sick, had been longer ill than Christ had lived on earth. He had been seven years afflicted before Christ was born. And even so this poor world has been long afflicted. Years before the Pentecost, or the birth of the present visible church, the poor sinful world lay at the pool, and could not stir. We must not be hopeless about it, for yet the Lord will cast sin out of it. Let us go in Jesus Christ's name and proclaim the everlasting Gospel, and say, "Rise, take up thy bed, and walk," and it shall be done, and God shall be glorified and we shall be blessed.

APOCALYPTIC PRECIS.

The Plan of the Book and the Order of the Series of Revelations.

BY PASTOR J. L. FULLER*

JOHN'S revelation received while he was a prisoner in Patmos as the book itself proves is from beginning to end, the book of the coming of the Lord. Now this coming has for its object two things: the redemption and glorifying his church; and the victory over and judgment of his enemies. Hence, in the beginning, the Lord addresses his church by telling her how and by what means she is to prepare herself to receive him, so that he may come to her for salvation and not for judgment. This is the purport of the seven epistles to the Seven Churches of Asia Minor, which we take to be representatives of the Church of Jesus Christ.

With the fourth chapter of the book begins The Series of Visions.

First, we see throned in heaven, governing in holiness and mercy, the Lord of the universe, surrounded by the heavenly Council, who worship him, the All-Powerful Creator of all things: he from whom all things come forth, has also set the ends of the world. This end is as yet a hidden one; hence it appears to the seer in the shape of a book with Seven Seals in the hands of him who sat upon the throne (chap. 5: 1.) Into whose hands shall God consign, i. e., to whom shall he confide the explanation and the carrying out of that consummation of the world? Nobody in heaven or on earth is worthy but the Lamb which was slain and by his blood created a new manhood. Hence the Lamb now approaches and receives the book from the One on the throne, and the hosannas of all creation. That to which it had laid the foundation through its sacrificial death; it is now to carry out to its completion, the new world for redeemed mankind: for such is the consummation of God's world-plan.

With the sixth chapter the Lamb begins to open the

of the Book. By the opening of the first four, we learn the events that are to inaugurate that consummation, and to prepare men for it.

They are: (1) the triumphant progress of the Gospel throughout the world, and in its support; (2) Famine; (3) War; and (4) Pestilence. Whether these will eventually procure the purpose for which they were sent, so that at last the whole human race will be ready to enter the new world, the Fifth Seal tells us (chap. 11: 9, etc.) From this we learn how the Gospel meets with such opposition in the world, that those who receive it are persecuted unto death, and their blood cries to God for vengeance. Hence the consummation cannot come until the world, hostile to the Gospel, shall have been destroyed in the judgment. Only in the judgment, symbolised in the Sixth Seal, is the last obstacle removed, and then the last Seal can and does reveal to us (chap. 8: 1) the new dawn of peace and salvation. Thus the Seven Seals show us how and by what means the coming of the Lord will be prepared and brought about, and why it is that he will not lead his people to that end without judgment.

But before the Seventh Seal shows us that final end,

A Double Vision

is introduced to the Seer (chap. 7: verses 1-8 and 9-17.) We are to learn from them, what will be the condition of God's Church when this judgment will come upon the earth. But it is a twofold Church which is shown us. It is (1) The old Testament Church, now converted to its God, which, in its corporate capacity as a nation, outlives the woes of the fifth Seal; and (2) The Church gathered from among the Gentiles, which, passing through persecution, will be saved and presented before the throne of God and the Lamb. If we give their proper place to these two visions among the Seven Seals, they give us the predestined future of the course of the world towards that consummation of God's government of the world.

(To be Concluded.)

HELPFUL HINTS

On Soul-Winning and Bible-Study.

I AM often asked, "What is the best handbook on Revivals?" There is but one answer to that question,—"The Book of Acts; that's God's encyclopædia on soul-winning."

There are thousands of pastors, tens of thousands of teachers and hundreds of thousands of people in the pew, who want a big revival this winter.

The pessimism in me has been all shaken out by the multitude of glorious workers I've found in the Church who, while, maybe, a little cold on the exterior, have the hot fires of holy zeal burning within; these want a revival of no mean kind; one that is born of God; one that has less of man and method in it, and more of the Holy Ghost.

Now, the question is, can such a season of soul-winning be had, and if so—how?

How?

I'm not sure but that the best thing is to answer: "How not to have it?" I'll give seven hints on that side:

REV. C. H. YATMAN.

1st. By trusting in man and man-made methods:

2nd. By expecting the planting of sea-shore pebbles to produce wheat-field harvests, or human words and wisdom to yield new births:

3rd. By continuance of the old barren ways and means:

4th. By unwillingness to follow the leadings of the Spirit:

5th. By disregard of God's revelation to us through the history of past revivals:

6th. By social and secular features displacing spiritual power:

7th. By sinful neglect of holy means.

All or any of these will bring a Church to the dryness of the bones in Ezekiel's vision.

Lots of them there now! But let us get to the other side, quick.

How can we have a good, big and lasting revival?

I answer: Meet the conditions God has named; easily found in the two great Revival Chapters of the Bible—Joel 2 and Acts 2.

I venture to say, if you will begin at the twelfth verse of the first-named chapter, and go on to the end, then get the swing of conquest in the Pentecost chapter, there is no power on earth or hell that can keep back the flood-tide of salvation that will set in; stick to these two chapters, don't go rambling all over Pentateuch, Psalms, Prophets and Pauline epistles.

It's a fact that whenever, and wherever revival seed is sown from these bins of God's truth, there comes a mighty harvest of souls.

Try it; try it. Don't question it, or quarrel over it, but try it.

Remember the chapters—Joel 2 and Acts 2. It's no use reading them first before people, or to people, or with people. Get alone, and read with only God and the angels by.

Let the preacher go to the church some week-day morning, when sexton as well as people are away; take a pew midway from door to pulpit, don't think of reading for full

*From his article in the November number of The Prophetic News, Edited by Rev. M. Baxter, which contains also articles on "The Six Successive periods of three hundred years;" "The Present Gap or Break in Jewish History" and several other articles on prophecy by eminent expositors. ten minutes, look around, ask what all you see means, and then out of the absolute silence, let God speak.

Glance up where the preacher stands, and then over the pews, speak aloud two words: "God and Eternity," and listen. The very stones will speak, as though they were children raised up unto Abraham. Follow this by prayer, real prayer, for the Holy Spirit's presence in power, then read the chapters, read and think.

Dinner may pass, supper may come and go, with your place vacant, but you will have bread they know not of. The promise in Psalm 20: verse 2, will be fulfilled to you, and to your people you will go, leading them as you have been led in these Scriptures, and the vision of Isaiah 35, will as surely be true to the flock of your care, as that Christianity followed Calvary.

Soul-Winning Texts.

Daniel 12: 3; James 5: 20; II. Corinthians 9: 8; John 5: 24; Isaiah 12: 2; Joshua 1: 8, 9; John 14: 12.

Success will crown the soul-winner who determines he will be crowned with nothing else. They win who believe they can.

Uncion from on high will be the secret of all success in saving souls. Better try to lift the mountains than work without this power. But mountains will be grains of sand to him who tarries successfully at Jerusalem for the Holy Ghost.

Common Sense is mightier than an army to turn men from sin to God. He who has most of this will most successful be.

Earnestness that tramples under foot hindrances, and makes things bend or break, will be to the man whose life work is winning men to Christ like the rod in Moses' hand.

Sword of the Spirit, in consecrated hands, wielded with judgment and power, is the weapon of victory. Without it the winner of men will be powerless; with it he can break in pieces thousands of stony hearts.

Sympathy and success never part company. The deeper the first, the higher the last. The more of the one the more of the other. Love never fails.

Mr. Spurgeon speaks of "ministers' fainting fits." Well, the soul-winner will have them quite as often; blue days with no sunshine and plenty of fog. Spend these days where the fragrance and perfume of the "Rose of Sharon" can reach you. Get beneath no juniper tree when the terrible heat of scorching days falls upon you; rather seek the shade of the Rock of Ages. When your case seems going against you, then away to your Advocate and Counsellor. He will deliver, for FAITH INSURES THE FINAL VICTORY.

A HINDOO CONVERTED IN NEW YORK.

WHILE the workers attached to the Berachah Mission in West Thirty-second Street, were holding their usual open-air service at the corner of Eighth Avenue a few weeks ago, a young native of India who was passing was attracted by the singing and stayed to listen. After the open-air exercises were ended, he was among the number who accepted the invitation given to attend the service in the Mission. There, he was observed to be listening intently to the earnest Gospel address in which, as is always done in that House of God, the way of salvation through Christ was clearly explained. At the close of the service, one of the Christian friends spoke to him and learned that it was the first time he had ever been told what Christianity really is and means. He told his story, from which it appeared that he was a veritable heathen, though otherwise a man of intelligence and education. He said he prayed regularly every day to his gods, which were represented by little golden images, and he brought them with him to this country. Never a day passed without his spending a portion of it in this idolatrous worship. He was much affected by what he had heard, and made no objection when it was proposed to pray with and for him. The prayer was heard. The Holy Spirit revealed the truth to his heart and the man became an earnest inquirer. Since that time he has been a frequent visitor at the Mission and has testified to the power of the Saviour over his heart and life. It seems that he had been but a few days in New York when he was at that open-air meeting. He had travelled from his home in Upper India to Calcutta and thence to America. He has given evidence of his sincerity by destroying his idols, having, as he naively observes, no use for them since he has found the real God. As soon as the business which brought him to America is completed he will return to India and he declares that it will be his joy to tell his family and friends the glad news which has changed his whole life and filled his heart with happiness and peace.

SELF SACRIFICE.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Dec. 6. II Cor. 5: 14, 15. I John 3: 16; I Peter 2: 22-24

He died for all, that they who live should not henceforth live unto themselves but unto him who died for them. The great mystery of the Cross becomes plain in these words. Paul says that Christ died for this. It was the law of self-sacrifice and the divine law giver set the seal to it with his own blood. The Christian, then—that is the man who is like Christ, the man who desires that in him shall be achieved the object for which Christ died—is the man who does not live for himself. He lives for him who died for him, and when he asks himself how he can live for Christ, he finds the answer in Christ's own words and life. Christ left us, an example that we should follow in his steps. Whatsoever is done for one of his brethren, he regards as done for him. Is there any one who wishes to render him a service? The opportunity is always at hand; let the service be rendered to some one in need, and for Christ's sake.

The familiar story of one who lent a young beginner in business the capital he needed, and when, after some years, the borrower offered to repay it, refused to take it, saying, "lend it to some one else who is in such need as you were in," gives the key to the law. An infinite obligation is laid upon the believer by the death of Christ. He can never repay it; but he can obey—he can show his gratitude in a way appointed, and that way is to live for others as Christ lived and died for him. It is an all-embracing, an intensely radical principle, going to the very roots of man's being, reaching every spring of action, transforming every motive, working in the smallest actions of life.

The story is told of a ship on fire in mid-ocean. The boats are filled with passengers and crew. Though they try to keep together they are separated in the night. In one boat are two brothers. The boat is over-crowded and it becomes apparent that, unless a vessel is sighted soon, all will be lost. Some must be sacrificed for the sake of the others. They decide to draw lots and he on whom the lot falls is to be thrown overboard. The lot falls on the elder of the two brothers. Then the younger protests. "I will die instead," he says. "My brother has a wife and children depending on him, while I am alone." Finally his offer is accepted and he is thrown overboard. But the love of life is strong, and the man swims after the boat. Becoming exhausted, he rests a hand on the gunwale. A hard-hearted sailor warns him off and when his warning is unheeded raises an axe and cuts off the hand. The swimmer clings with the other hand. That, too, is severed. The men in the boat can bear no more. They say, "We will live or perish together," and they take the maimed man back into the boat and they bind up his wounds. An hour or two later a sail is seen and all on the boat are rescued, and taken safe to land. What shall the elder brother do? Will he work for the brother who volunteered to die in his place and who cannot work for himself, now that he has lost his hands? Or will he forget the service and leave his brother to starve? As he decides, we judge of his character. As we judge, we judge ourselves. Christ died for us that henceforth we should not live unto ourselves. Are we too busy working for our own interests, accumulating a fortune, providing for future ease, striving for honor and power to think of him and what he wishes? Then so far as we are concerned Christ died in vain. Our eternal future may be secure. God knows. But our lives are not redeemed; we are living to ourselves. We are defrauding Christ of the object for which he lived and for which he laid down his life.

A NOBLE KING'S DAUGHTER.

VERY hearty is the welcome accorded to Lady Henry Somerset on her visit to the United States. She is Vice-President of the English branch of the King's Daughters, and in that capacity is their guest. But there are other organizations which claim her as a member, for Lady Somerset is deeply concerned about the condition of the poor and those who by their own fault or misfortune are in trouble, and is always ready to aid any well devised scheme for their benefit. Last week she took a prominent part in the meetings of the World's Women's Christian Temperance Union in Boston, Mass. She is President of the British Women's Temperance Association, and had much to tell of the work that Association is doing across the Atlantic. Her interest, too, in the work of Rev. Hugh Price Hughes among the London poor was manifest in an impassioned address she made on October 17th in New York, when she told with matchless pathos what she had seen of the privations and hardships of the denizens of the London slums. Women wept and men felt their eyes grow dim as they listened to these stories of sorrow which the high-bred lady told in plain simple words, but evidently with heartfelt sympathy. "It is time," she said, in eloquent pleading, "that Christian men and women should cease to sit contented in the plenty of their comfortable homes unconcerned about those who are suffering and starving around them." She could speak, too, in sympathy with women of her own class, many of whom, she said, were sad at heart because of the sorrow they knew of, but could not alleviate, and the burdens that they knew their humble sisters were bearing without their help. They have their sorrows, too, Lady Henry said; hearts weary of gaiety and pleasure, travelling in spiritual darkness, longing for light, yet too weak to follow where it leads even when they recognize it. Of all the grand work she is doing in England, her King's Daughter badge is the symbol. She works in many organizations, but the spirit of the King's Daughter is in them all. The order may well be proud of such a member.

Lady Henry Somerset, whose portrait is here given, is the wife of the second son of the Duke of Beaufort and a daughter of Earl Somers.

AN OFFICIAL RECOGNITION.

It is gratifying to learn that the Ohio Synod of the Reformed Church has officially recognized the Christian Endeavor movement and called the attention of the pastors to its advantages. The following were the resolutions passed by the Synod:

First—That we commend the Y. P. S. C. E. to the careful consideration of our pastors, and request them to investigate carefully its claims, methods and actual workings, with reference to its introduction into their midst.

Second—That classes, as far as practical, appoint classical organizers to push systematically this work forward.

Third—That as soon as convenient this Synod open a column in the statistical report in order to record its numerical strength.

Fourth—That a committee be appointed to arrange a course of reading covering the history, polity and doctrines of the Reformed Church for the Y. P. S. C. E. societies.

AN EXCELLENT C. E. PLAN.

WE are glad to give all publicity to a plan devised by the Christian Endeavor Union of Chicago which embraces one hundred and fifty-seven Societies. The circular issued fully describes the plan and therefore speaks for itself. All that needs to be said about it should be said to the Christian Endeavor Societies of every large city, and that may be said in the words of the Master to the man who asked him "Who is my neighbor?" "Go and do likewise." This is the circular:

The Correspondence Committee of the Christian Endeavor Union hopes to provide a Christian welcome and a church home for every new-comer to Chicago, to extend the greeting of Christ's love to men and women, before they are met by the almost overpowering temptations of our city life. Thousands of young men, and many young women, come to Chicago to make their way in business, not knowing when they come a single person in the city, no one from whom to get advice, help, sympathy, or the home love that helps so many of us to keep right, or which comforts and restores us after a fall. To them, eager for companionship and for a little happiness, the saloons, theatres, concert halls, billiard rooms, race tracks open wide arms of welcome. Shall Christ's Church not go out and bring them in?

How do we hope to do this? If the Corresponding Secretary of any C. E. Society, or any member of any such Society, or any Christian in the world, knows one who is coming, or has come, to Chicago, whom they wish to have surrounded by Christian influence, welcomed by Christians into Christ's Church, or helped in any way, let them write a letter to the Secretary of the C. E. Correspondence Committee, 148 Madison Street, Chicago, Ill., U. S. A. In this letter let them give the full name, the Chicago address, a description of the person to be welcomed, their denominational preferences, and any particulars which would guide us. The Secretary will send the letter to the member of the Society nearest the address given, and that member will immediately call on the new-comer, and extend to him all Christian courtesy and every privilege his particular branch of Christ's Church can offer.

This is the plan. Will you pray that God will make it fruitful for good, and make every member of the Committee faithful? Will you help by spreading information and by sending us names of those who, like us, need Christ's love and help and care?

THE NEW YORK CIRCLES.

THE annual meeting of the King's Daughters of New York State was held on November 23rd, in Madison Avenue Methodist Episcopal Church in New York. We go to press too early to give a report of the proceedings, but the indications at the time of writing are that the Assembly would be one of intense interest and very numerous attendance. Among the speakers whose names are on the programme, are Lady Henry Somerset, Vice President of the English Order (whose portrait is given on this page), Mrs. Hannah Whitall Smith, the treasurer of the same organization, beside many leaders in the American Order.

NEW HEADQUARTERS.

CONGRATULATIONS to the King's Daughters are in order. The home of the Central Council and the Headquarters of the Order have been transferred to more commodious quarters at No. 158 West Twenty-third Street, New York. This change has long been needed. The old quarters in Twenty-second Street have been outgrown. They were sufficient so long as the number of members was small and the business and correspondence could be carried on with a few officers and clerks, but that time is past and more room and more conveniences were imperatively demanded. The new home is well adapted to the work to be done there and it is easy of access to visiting members. It will do for the present, but we should not be surprised if in the not far-distant future a few wealthy members of the order should feel prompted to present their sisters with a permanent home of their own, that they may sit under their own roof, if not under their own vine and fig-tree, where no rent-collector can make them afraid.

HOME THANKSGIVINGS.

Uncle John Tells About the First Thanksgiving Day and how it was Celebrated.

THANKSGIVING is a season of pleasant memories. As the households of America gather around their well-laden tables to-morrow and the members realize that turkey is still the national bird and that pumpkin pie-making is not yet a lost art, the abundance of cheer, the flow of good feeling and the hearty appetites with which all will attack the dainties spread before them will open the heart to generous impulses. We are well-disposed to all mankind on Thanksgiving Day. The beggar will not knock at our door in vain, and the poor family on the next street, whose son and only dependence for support was lamed last week, will be remembered before we ourselves have fed. The spirit of true thankfulness to the Divine Giver comes upon us mightily as a nation, and we feel that we would indeed be ungrateful if we did not acknowledge God's surpassing goodness to our beloved land.

This was the feeling in one little household, day before Thanksgiving. The weather cool, and clear, and seasonably bracing; mother busy superintending the preparation of the feast for the morrow, and deeply immersed in the mysteries of pies, puddings and toothsome sauces; father expected at home for a whole holiday, and Cousin Martin the special guest of Tom and Ted and the girls for the occasion. Two big baskets of good things including, it was whispered, turkeys, or at least chickens, had been sent away by Jane the maid-of-all-work, to be put by two poor families in the neighborhood where they would do the most good. Kate, the cook, was to be seen occasionally at the door of the kitchen, which was guarded with extreme jealousy, while there occasionally issued thence a sound of simmering, and stewing, and basting, accompanied by a fragrance that was eagerly sniffed by the youngsters.

Having nothing else to do, meantime, the young folks besieged Uncle John with inquiries about to-morrow's anticipated feast.

"Dear me!" said the traveler with a reminiscent sigh, as he turned his toes toward the glowing fire, "I remember those Thanksgiving times we used to have at the old home, down East. Such pies and fat turkeys, and such nuts, and apples, and games, after the dinner! Mother—that's grandma, you know—invented all sorts of amusements for us boys and girls, and when we were tired playing 'Blind Man's Buff,' or popping corn on the fire, father would tell us again the story of the first Thanksgiving, and how the Puritans kept it in the olden time."

"Do tell us about it, Uncle," cried the children with one voice.

"Well, you know of course from your histories, when the Pilgrims landed at Plymouth. It was on the occasion of their first harvest, in 1622, that the good Governor Bradford sent four men out hunting for game for the impoverished colony, that 'that they might in a more special manner rejoice together' over God's goodness in giving them an abundant crop that year. There had been times when the colony came very near starving; but now there was a prospect of plenty for all. The Puritans were very simple folks; they didn't observe any of the festival days of the Church of England and believed in worshipping the Lord in the most primitive manner. Almost their first act after landing at Plymouth Rock was to assign a 'Lord's-Day meeting-place' for themselves—a timber fort, strong and comely, with flat roof and battlements. To this church they walked every Sabbath, three in a row, until 1648, when a larger and better one was built. So it was no doubt from this unpainted log meeting-house built square with clay filled in between the chinks and a straw-thatched roof and earthen floor that the first Thanksgiving prayer and praise ascended to heaven for the good things of the year. The boys and girls of the colony met there in the bleak weather warmly wrapped, and joined in the services with their elders—a very different place from the fine churches we have nowadays, and calculated to be used as a fort, in case of attack by the savage Indians. Everybody had a special interest in going to church in those days, for every able-bodied colonist had helped to build the meeting-house. Some had cut and driven logs for it, others had given their own labor and that of their horses, and I can believe that even the young lads lent a hand where they could.

"After the special services at the meeting-house were over," he continued, "the colonists sat down to the feast for which the four hunters had provided game. Wild turkeys may have been cooked, although we are not told about this; at any rate, we know that very soon after, when Thanksgiving had become a fixed yearly festival, turkey was the honored and universal dish all through the colonies. But you may be sure there was plenty pumpkin pie. A year afterward, Governor Bradford appointed a day in July, 1623, as a day of Thanksgiving for rain, for the drought had been terrible; another day was appointed to give thanks for the arrival of supplies from the mother-country, and after this third festival day the custom was fairly established. There is a beautiful poem on the subject by Mrs. Margaret J. Preston, in which that first Thanksgiving Dinner in 1622 is described. Here are some of the verses:

"AND now," said the Governor, gazing
Abroad on the piled-up store
Of the sheaves that dotted the clearings,
And covered the meadows o'er,
'Tis meet that we render praises
Because of this yield of grain;
'Tis meet that the Lord of the harvest
Be thanked for his sun and rain.

"And therefore, I, William Bradford, (By the grace of God to-day,
And the franchise of his good people),
Governor of Plymouth, say
Thro' virtue of vested power—
Ye shall gather with one accord,
And hold in the month of November,
Thanksgiving unto the Lord.

"So shoulder your matchlocks, masters;
There is hunting of all degrees;
And fishermen, take your tackle
And scour for spoil the seas:

And maidens and dames of Plymouth,
Your delicate crafts employ
To honor our first Thanksgiving,
And make it a feast for joy."

At length came the day appointed;
The snow had begun to fall,
But the clang from the Meeting-House belfry
Rang merrily out for all,
And summoned the folk of Plymouth,
Who hastened with glad accord
To listen to Elder Brewster
As he fervently thanked the Lord.

And when Massasoit, the Sachem,
Sate down with his hundred braves,
And ate of the varied riches
Of gardens and woods and waves,
And looked on the granaried harvest—
With a blow on his brawny chest—
He muttered: "The great Good Spirit Loves his white children best."

And then, when the feast was ended,
With gravely official air,
The Governor drew his broadsword
Out from—its scabbard there,
And, smiting the trencher near him,
He cried, in heroic way:
"Hail! Pie of the Pumpkin! I dub thee Prince of Thanksgiving Day!"

"When the Dutch governors ruled in New Netherlands, and the English governors in New York, they adopted the good old Puritan fashion of Thanksgiving Day, and during the Revolutionary War it became a national day, Congress itself taking action about it. You may remember, too, that General Washington recommended a day of thanksgiving for the adoption of the Constitution. Now, the President's proclamation is followed by that of the Governors of the different states all over the Union. So the godly gratitude of the little company in Plymouth has set the pattern for a festival which, next to the Fourth of July, is the dearest to the hearts of America parents and their children."

"They don't have Thanksgiving all over the world, do they?" asked one of the little auditors.

"In a way, they have; but Uncle Sam's little boys and girls have a special Thanksgiving Day all to themselves. In the older countries, the nations almost without exception set aside a day to render thanks to the giver of the harvest. But even Thanksgiving isn't new, for the ancient Jews had the Feast of the Wheat-Harvest or 'First-fruits,' and then, what more nearly corresponds with our own day, the Feast of Tabernacles or 'Ingathering of the Harvest.' They lasted seven days each and were the greatest seasons of rejoicing in the whole year. On both occasions the people were commanded to appear in the Temple or Tabernacle and make their offerings."

"This year," said Uncle John, in conclusion, "we have the grandest crops, the finest pumpkins, the biggest and reddest apples, the best ears of corn and, of course, the primest, fattest and sweetest turkeys in the world. We're going to feed pretty near half of Europe, too, for their crops have failed badly. So when you sit down to dinner to-morrow, and when Kate brings in the great turkey, done to a lovely brown and fit for a king to eat, remember all these things, and add to your papa's offering of thanks to the Giver of all gifts, a humble tribute from your own hearts to him who invites us to come before his presence with thanksgiving and a joyful noise."

The Coming Girl.

The coming girl will cook her own food, will make her own living, and will not die an old maid. The coming girl will know how to work, will not endeavor to break the hearts of unsophisticated young men, will spell correctly, understand English before she affects French, will preside with equal grace at the piano or wash-tub, will spin more yarn for the house than for the street, and will not despise her plainly-clad mother, her poor relations, or the hand of an honest worker.

She will walk five miles a day, if need be, to keep her cheeks aglow; will mind her health, her physical development, and her mother; will adopt a costume both sensible and conducive to health, will not confound hypocrisy with politeness; will not place lying to please above frankness.

She will not go to Paris, but to reason for her fashions; will not aim to follow a foolish fashion because milliners and dressmakers decree it; will not torture her body, shrivel her soul with puerilities or ruin it with wine and pleasure. In short, the coming girl will seek to glorify her Maker and to enjoy mentally his works. Duty will be her aim, and life a living reality.

GEORGE WASHINGTON'S PRAYER.*

AS a matter of interest to Christians everywhere and especially to those in our own land, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to-day lays before its readers a most precious relic, being a fac-simile reproduction of a page from the manuscript prayer-book of George Washington. The question is frequently asked: "Was Washington a Christian?" and the little book from which the page printed above is taken furnishes indisputable evidence of the deep interest "The Father of His Country" took in spiritual things. The book in question—which is about the size of an ordinary 24-page memorandum book—was the property of Lawrence Washington, a relative of the first President, and afterward passed into the possession of William Evarts Benjamin, of New York, who has now arranged for its publication. The book contains prayers, in Washington's own chirography, for every morning and evening during the different days of the week, and is written with the neatness and plainness that were characteristic of the great patriot. These prayers abound in earnest thought, expressed in simple, fervent language, and cannot fail to afford an insight into the secret of his strength. No one can read them without having a grander conception of Washington's character.

I SHOULD not have so much difficulty," said Alexander, "with the present humble condition of Jesus, and the spiritual character of his claims, as with the apparent fact that he was not born in Bethlehem and is not a son of David—as the Messiah must be."

"That has been my great difficulty," said Simeon. "It is everywhere claimed in Judea that Jesus is a Galilean, a Nazarene, and of parentage so humble that he is on that account in disfavor with even the people of Nazareth."

Aleph ventured to inquire whether some branches of David's line had not, in the course of centuries, sunk into an humble condition; and whether it was not possible that Jesus belonged to some such decayed branch—also, whether he might not have been born in Bethlehem, though brought up elsewhere?

"I think," said Simeon, "that we are hardly entitled to say no to either of these questions of the young man. I myself was born in Jerusalem, though brought up in this city. The family of David is now lost among the common people; and, though it can be recovered in our genealogies, I never could learn that the enemies of Jesus have taken the pains to examine them with reference to his claims. Having settled in their minds that such a Messiah as Jesus is neither what they expected nor wanted, they easily accepted without examination such rumors in regard to him as agreed with their wishes and foregone conclusions. So, at least, it seems to me."

"Can you tell us about what the age of Jesus is?" asked Cimon.

"He appears, I am told, somewhat less than forty; perhaps he is not much more than thirty years. I took special pains to inquire about this; partly because of an experience of my father's some thirty years ago, and partly because of wide-spread rumors at that time of a remarkable birth which had just taken place in connection with celestial phenomena. However, the matter was kept as close as possible from fear of Herod. My father at that time was living in Jerusalem—a very old man and as saintly as old. For a long while he had expressed to his family an assurance that he should live to see the Christ. One day he came home from the temple with a radiant face, saying that he was now ready to depart, for he had just seen and held in his arms an infant which an inward Divine voice told him was the Messiah. He then lay down, calmly closed his eyes, and departed in a peaceful sleep. This I had from my sister, for I was in Alexandria at the time. All this was widely known at the time, but was spoken of by the people under their breath on account of the jealousy and cruelty of the rulers. Now at that time Jesus must have been an infant."

"And we happen to know," said Aleph, looking at Cimon, "that the name of the infant concerning whom such remarkable things were told was Jesus—though we may not at present tell how we came by the knowledge."

As Aleph said these words he could not well help noticing three things—the cordial look that Simeon gave him, the look of exasperation on the face of Ben Abner, and the start made by Rachel, whose attitude of earnest attention throughout the conversation would have been evident enough even if her veil had not been gradually drawn somewhat aside as she watched the speakers. Alexander also noticed the start. Perhaps he feared a return of yesterday's faintness. He bent over her, and spoke in a low tone. She shook her head.

"However, we will go home," said he, "as soon as I have put off these vestments."

"He retired to the vestry, followed by the other elders.

Aleph approached the maiden and said that he had been glad to hear from her father that her nurse continued to mend, and expressed that she herself was none the worse for her indisposition of yesterday.

"Not at all," she said, promptly; "but I was absorbingly interested in the subject of the conversation, and was, I confess, startled by what you said of your knowledge of the infant Jesus. You were not then born."

"No, lady; my knowledge is altogether second-hand, but is none the less certain for that. My friend here has some original knowledge in the case; but both of us have, in addition to this, sources of information that are beyond all question."

"I very much fear," said she with a sigh, "when I hear Ben Abner and others, that our people will be found treating a new prophet as they have ever treated prophets. What do you think?"

"I also have my fears."

"But you also have knowledge; and if at any time it becomes consistent for you to share your knowledge with others, none will welcome it more gladly than I. Till then I believe in it and—in you"—and her eyes, which till then had been unconsciously perusing his face as she spoke, sank before his, and the loveliest color deepened on the loveliest features that the Chaldean, or even the more experienced Greek, had ever seen.

What was that? A confused sound as of a struggle and disputing voices came from the direction of the great door on the street of Canopus. This was soon followed by the noisy tramp on the marble pavement of what seemed in the distance a body of soldiers. As they came nearer they were seen to be indeed some twelve Roman soldiers in full armor, carrying at their head a standard—the legionary standard, consisting of a pike surmounted by a silver eagle, on whose spread wings stood an effigy of the emperor, with this superscription in large capitals—DEUS TIBERIUS CÆSAR.

The soldiers were being followed at a short distance by a weeping, groaning, threatening crowd of Jews who had tried, it would seem, to prevent the entrance of the party with their desecrating symbol, and were now following them with lamentations and execrations.

As the band came near, Aleph easily recognized in the leader of it the drunken officer whom he had disarmed on the Nile. Almost as soon the two friends were recognized by the Roman; and, with an oath, he at once led the way to where they stood (they had planted themselves in front of Rachel), although at that moment Alexander and his elders were hastily coming forward from the vestry.

"I have found you at last," the man cried, as he disposed his soldiers in a semicircle, "and you will not easily escape me."

Alexander had now come up.

"As the head of the community worshipping here, I demand to know for what purpose you have come into this sanctuary with standard and arms?"

"To give you and your friends," the officer replied with mock solemnity, "an opportunity, which no doubt you will gratefully accept, to pay an act of religious worship to the great god Tiberius Cæsar—after this manner," and he knelt before the standard, and, with both hands lifted, cried, "Great God, I worship thee."

Rising, he exclaimed, "Now I have set you an example—copy it, every one of you!"

The crowd behind groaned and hissed.

The officer shook his fist at them and shouted, "Be still, you snakes and swine; your turn will come shortly. Let your betters lead off. It is their privilege. Come, begin, Pontifex Maximus!"—turning to Alexander.

"I demand of you by what authority you make this demand on us," demanded the Alabarch.

The Roman pointed to the image of the emperor.

"Do you mean to say that an order has come from Rome for violating the sanctuaries of the Jews, and revoking the edicts which from the founding of the city have guaranteed to us our own religious views and usages?"

"The Roman senate has decreed Divine honors to the emperor; and his image has been received and worshipped in every place of worship in this city, saving the synagogues of the Jews. Now you shall have your turn."

"That is no answer to my question. The Jews have always had special privileges in this city, and one of them is to refuse worship to every god but their own. Again I ask, has this privilege been recalled by the emperor since yesterday: for yesterday I received a personal letter from him in which he promised to abate nothing from our privileges."

The Roman made no answer, but conferred with one of his men in a low voice. After a moment's delay, Alexander continued:

"It is plain that you have no authority from the emperor for this outrage. Have you for it the authority of the governor, or of the prefect of the city? I await your careful reply."

"We are carrying out the wishes of the representatives of Rome in Alexandria," said the fellow, sullenly.

"And that is no answer to my question. Are we to understand that Avilleus Flaccus, or Urbanus Civicus, undertakes on his own responsibility to set aside the decrees of kings and emperors for four hundred years; those of the reigning emperor included, and has expressly sent you here to-day for this purpose?"

"We did not come here," said the officer with a face that was fast becoming purple, "to be catechised."

"You came here," said Alexander, sternly, "to commit an outrage—came as a private venture of yourself and a few mischievous companions, and without authority from your superiors. You deserve heavy punishment, and I hope you will get it. Now begone from the sanctuary which you have profaned!"

"Begone!" echoed the elders. "BEGONE!" shouted and screamed the mob from behind.

"Whatever privileges you cursed Jews may have, they certainly do not belong to these men"—pointing at Cimon and Aleph. "These are no more Jews than I am. And for aught I know the same is true of this woman. We will see"—and he stepped toward Rachel to lift her veil.

"Stand back," said Aleph sternly, as he placed his hand on the breast of the man and sent him staggering back on his men.

Before the man could recover himself, Alexander interfered: "This lady is my daughter; and as for these men, they are of our faith, and as co-religionists are entitled to our immunities."

"And if it were not so," said Aleph, "it may be well for this man to know that under no conceivable circumstances would we pay religious worship to the emperor, though quite ready to pay the magistrates all due observance."

"We will see," cried the Roman in a transport of fury, as he rushed on the young man with his drawn sword. "Down on your knees to the standard this instant, you renegade, or by Jupiter, I will put you on your knees for the rest of your life," and he struck at his knees.

Aleph caught the blow with his cane. Whereupon the officer lost all self-restraint and made a rapid succession of strokes and thrusts that sought life. But Aleph had evidently learned the art of fence; his cane was as good as a shield and met the sword a every point. At last, after a desperate lunge, the sword went flying aloft; and both Cimon and Aleph had seized its master.

"EXPUL THEM!" shouted Alexander to the crowd of Jews that was now surging and roaring like a maddened sea, "Expel them with your canes and your hands! They have forced an entrance into our sanctuary, they have profaned it with an idol, and now they have sought to stain it with the blood of unarmed men. EXPUL THEM, I say!"

The mob needed no spur. They threw themselves on the soldiers, already cowed by what had passed, and in a moment were dragging them, disarmed and unresisting, behind Cimon and Aleph with their prisoner. Had it not been for the example of coolness and forbearance set by our friends and an occasional moderating word from them, the people might have torn their prisoners limb from limb. As it was, the soldiers had no gentle handling. They had little armor left on them when they reached the great doors. They had gotten many an accidental elbowing and tripping. Somehow the people had stumbled heavily and found it hard to recover themselves. There were few parts of these Roman bodies which had not become intimately acquainted with both the point and broadside of a cane. Their captain suffered least—in fact, suffered nothing beyond the shame and uneasiness of being held fast in iron hands.

When those hands were taken off, just outside the great door, he suddenly drew a knife from a fold in his sash and made pass at Aleph. But both friends were vigilant; and Cimon, while beating off the knife with one hand, with the other dealt the rascal such a blow on the head that his helmet flew off and went clattering down the steps into the street. He followed staggering. The people behind, seeing only the cuff and the result, cheered, and very cheerfully followed the example supposed to be set them. Each soldier received such a hearty cuff and push as he went down the steps as made his descent little less than a fall.

Once down, they were not allowed to linger. The blood of the people was up; and the followed the soldiers in their precipitate flight a long distance with menacing cries and gestures, and with such missiles as they happened to find in the street.

Meanwhile the friends had been called within the synagogue by Alexander, and the great doors fastened. What consultation took place it is not necessary to record. There were consultations; and that, too, of a very political and secular sort. The situation of the Jews was always delicate. There was much reason to fear that the morning's disturbance would seriously embroil them with the authorities at both Alexandria and Rome. What should be done? If any one has light, let him speak out at once—though it be Sabbath.

But none had scruples. The ideas of the Alexandrian Jews of the first century were not exactly like those of some of their ancestors in the time of Maccabees, who refused to defend themselves against their enemies on the Sabbath because self-defense was work, and that too of the severest sort. The children had become wiser if not better. They had come to believe that self-preservation is a work of necessity, not to say of mercy; and were ready to fight the idolaters seven days in the week, if necessary, for even a less matter than self-preservation—as we have seen. They would not consent to be martyrs till they had tried hard to be victors. They would not be idolaters, and they did not want to be rebels. They wanted to preserve their religion, and also wanted to preserve themselves. Was it possible? Let us see, said the Seventy, as they resumed their gilded chairs. So the men who did not hesitate to fight a battle on the Sabbath did not scruple to consult on that day how to prevent the battle from souring into a defeat. Were they wrong in this?

Cimon and Aleph answered in the negative. I am not sure but that I agree with them. Doubtless a council of war may be as holy as a prayer-meeting. I once knew of one that was holier, but that began with a prayer.

But a narrative is like a star—it perishes if it stops moving. So let us proceed.

V.

THE UNIVERSITY.

EARLY the next morning, Cimon and Aleph transferred themselves and their effects to a small khan in the Egyptian quarter of the city. This was done for the following reasons:

The events of the Sabbath seemed to make it prudent to withdraw from public notice as much as possible. Of course, the son of Flaccus was a source of danger: and then the seeming look of recognition on the face of Malus, which both of them had noticed, was not a pleasant feature of the situation. It was the silent lightning on the horizon. They felt it even more important, just then, to keep out of the sight of the Jew than it was to keep out of the sight of the Roman. Especially after an incident that occurred on their way back from the synagogue.

As they came down the steps of the Diapleuston, they noticed a Jew across the street, watching them. Before they had gone far, Aleph, happening to look behind, saw the man following, and spoke of it to Cimon. They walked slower—at length very slowly. The man slackened his pace to suit. They walked faster—at length very fast. The man quickened his pace correspondingly. It was annoying.

"Let us go to meet him," said Cimon, "and see if he will retreat."

He stood still, in some confusion, till they came up.

"Can we do anything for you?" inquired the Greek. "If so we are at your service."

"I certainly owe you an apology," stammered the Jew. "The fact is, I was in the synagogue at the time of the disturbance, and was so struck with the very great likeness of this young man to one whom I saw many years ago that I determined to wait for his coming out and to follow him. I now have an opportunity to thank you both for standing up so boldly and effectually for us to-day."

THE CURSE OF INDIA.

Hira Lal Kumar, the Hindoo Quaker, on the Odious Opium Traffic of his Native Land.

TWO young and highly educated Hindoos, Hira Lal Kumar and K. Ram Chundra, have just returned to England from a visit to this country, undertaken for the purpose of arousing American sentiment against the opium traffic in Hindustan. Both are law students at Oxford, England, where they went to complete their education, with the view of practicing at the bar in India. Hira Lal Kumar, who is a member of a very old and distinguished Hindoo family, tracing its descent back to a period anterior to the Moslem era in that country, became a Christian several years ago, and lately united with the Quaker Brotherhood in England. For two years past he, with Mr. Chundra, has labored to stir up public sentiment in the United Kingdom against the traffic in the baleful drug which is proving the curse of the Hindoos.

HIRA LAL KUMAR.

Swarthy, strongly-built and turbaned, Mr. Kumar has an earnest and intelligent face and bright, suave manner that at once inspire confidence. He is an enthusiast in the crusade against opium and eloquently explains many of the misapprehensions that now exist regarding the Indian product and its relation to the moral and commercial welfare of the Empire.

"It is a popular error," he said, "to suppose that if the opium trade were taken away, the native population of India would suffer. I have heard on every side the objection raised that the Hindoos would starve if the raising of opium were prohibited; but it is not true. Only the Europeans in India and a few interested traders among the natives would be the sufferers. The best land is monopolized in its cultivation, and this land could be used to raise almost any other crops, wheat, rice, cotton, or anything that grows on Indian soil. It is the policy of the English rulers of India, despite their protestations to the contrary, to keep up the opium trade.

"Opium is the curse of India! It ruins our people, morally, mentally and physically; it keeps them poor, because it keeps the finest and most productive land in the hands of the opium-growers, instead of devoting it to wholesome crops to supply our wants. Under the sanction of the British government about 4,500 tons of this drug are grown annually, one-fourth of which is consumed in India. The traffic has originated and extended under the English, and they are responsible before God for its results. It has been fostered at the expense of the morality of 700,000,000 Hindoos and Chinese, and has brought disgrace upon the name of Christian, and been a serious barrier to missionary labors. All this has been done in fifty years. I understand it reaches the homes of many wealthy men and women in America. It has been found almost impossible to prevent smuggling the drug; the only remedy is to limit its production. To secure this object, we have petitioned the British government and people, as we now appeal to the American people, to aid in this righteous war against an evil that is slaying my own nation and injuring others also.

"Ram Chundra and I are mere students in England and our means are limited. Out of my allowance from home, I have paid my expenses thus far, including my visit to America and the printing and other expenses connected with the anti-opium crusade. We have already received the cordial co-operation of many good people in the United States and promises from others. In England we are endeavoring to have Parliament take up the matter in the true Christian spirit."

The women of Western India have petitioned the Christian Women of England in the interest of the crusade. Ever since the days of John Bright's championship, the Quakers of England have been warm friends of the Hindoos, and bitter enemies of the opium trade, and the two young Hindoo law students have found among the Friends their warmest supporters. Ram Chundra is a native of the Presidency of Madras, while Hira Lal Kumar is from Calcutta, where he was born in the village of Utterpara, in 1864. He is a member of the Honorable Society of Gray's Inn, London, the oldest legal society in the world. Both young men have exhausted their funds in pushing the crusade and creating sentiment with the ultimate view of Parliamentary action, but they consider that in this they have done no more than their duty as Christians.

A portrait of Mr. Kumar is given on this page. Any readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who may feel sufficiently interested in their mission to aid in its furtherance, can do so by forwarding their contributions to Hunt & Eaton, 150 Fifth Avenue, New York City, by whom all moneys so received will be sent to Hira Lal Kumar, 38 Hayfield Road, Oxford, England.

Many a life has been lost because of the taste of cod-liver oil.

If Scott's Emulsion did nothing more than take that taste away, it would save the lives of some at least of those that put off too long the means of recovery.

It does more. It is half-digested already. It slips through the stomach as if by stealth. It goes to make strength when cod-liver oil would be a burden.

THE PURITAN SUNDAY.*

SETTLERS were eager to build meeting-houses; for these houses of God were to them the visible sign of the establishment of that theocracy which they had left their fair homes and had come to New England to create and perpetuate. But lest some future settlements should be slow or indifferent about doing their duty promptly, it was enacted in 1675 that a meeting-house should be erected in every town in the colony; and if the people failed to do so at once, the magistrates were empowered to build it and to charge the cost of its erection to the town. The number of members necessary to establish a separate church was very distinctly given in the Platform of Church Discipline: "A church ought not to be of greater number than can ordinarily meet conveniently in one place, nor ordinarily fewer than may conveniently carry on church work." Each church was quite independent in its work and government, and had absolute power to admit, expel, control and censure its members. The first meeting-houses were simple buildings—square log-houses with clay-filled chimneys, surmounted with steep roofs thatched with long straw or grass, and often with only the beaten earth for a floor. It was considered a great advance and a matter of proper pride when the settlers had the meeting-house "lathed on the inside and so daubed and whitened over workmanlike." The second Roxbury church was set on a high hill, and the story is fairly pathetic of the aged and feeble John Eliot, the glory of New England Puritanism, that once, as he toiled patiently up the ascent to his dearly loved meeting, he said to the person on whose supporting arm he leaned: "This is very like the way to heaven; 'tis uphill. The Lord by his grace fetch us up."

The Old Pews.

In the early New England meeting-houses the seats were long, narrow, uncomfortable benches, which were made of simple, rough, hand-riven planks placed on legs like milking-stools. They were without any support or rest for the back; and perhaps the stiff-backed Pilgrims and Puritans required or wished no support. Quickly, as the colonies grew in wealth and the colonists in ambition and importance, "spots for pews" were sold (or "pits" as they were sometimes called) at first to some rich or influential men who wished to sit in a group together, and finally each family of dignity or wealth sat in its own family-pew. Often it was stipulated in the permission to build a pew that a separate entrance door should be cut into it through the outside wall of the meeting-house, thus detracting grievously from the symmetry of the outside of the edifice, but obviating the necessity of a space-occupying entrance aisle within the church, where there was little enough sitting-room for the quickly increasing and universally church-going population. As these pews were either oblong or square, large or small, painted or unpainted, and as each pew-holder could exercise his own "tast and discrediting" in the kind of wood he used as well as in the style of finish, much diversity and incongruity of course resulted. Many of the pews in the old meeting-houses had towering partition walls which extended up so high that only the tops of the tallest heads could be seen when the occupants were seated. Permissions to build were often given with modifying restrictions to the aspiring pew-builders, as for instances is recorded of the Haverhill church, "providing they would not build so high as to damnify or hinder the light of them windows," or of the Waterbury church, "if the pews will not progodish the hous."

Lengthy Exercises.

Dr. Lord of Norwich always made a prayer which was one hour long; and an early Dutch traveller who visited New England asserted that he had heard there on Fast Day a prayer which was two hours long. These long prayers were universal and were highly esteemed—a poor gift in prayer being a most deplored and even despised short-coming. Whitefield prayed openly for Parson Barrett of Hopkinton, who could pray neither freely nor well, that "God would open this dumb dog's mouth"; and everywhere in the Puritan church, precatory eloquence as evinced in long prayers was felt to be the greatest glory of the minister, and the highest tribute to God. The colonists could not leave the meeting-house before the long services were ended, even had they wished, for the tithingman allowed no deserters. In Salem, in 1676, it was "ordered by ye selectmen yt the three constables doe attend att ye three greate doores of ye meeting-house every Lodes Day at ye end of ye sermon, both ye forenoone and afternoone, and to keep ye doores fast and suffer none to goe out before ye whole exercises be ended." As the years passed the church attendants became less reverential and more impatient. A minister, about to preach in a neighboring parish, was told of a custom which prevailed there of persons living at a distance rising and leaving the house ere the service was ended. He determined to teach them a lesson, and announced that he would preach the first part of his sermon to the sinners, and the latter part to the saints, and that the sinners might leave as soon as their portion had been delivered. Every soul remained to the end of the service.

SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE FOR 1892:

It is not possible to give, in a brief space, an account of all the features in preparation, but the following announcements will indicate that the material is deficient neither in importance nor range of subject:

The Poor in the World's Great Cities.

A series of articles, giving the results of special study among the poor, elaborately illustrated.

Important Moments.

A series of very short articles describing the signal occasions when some decisive event took place, as the first use of the Atlantic cable, the first use of the telegraph, experiment with ether, etc.

Washington Allston.

UNPUBLISHED REMINISCENCES AND LETTERS of this foremost among early American painters.

Out of Door Papers.

A number of seasonable articles, among them being: SMALL COUNTRY PLACES, how to lay out and beautify them, by SAMUEL PARSONS, JR.
MOUNTAIN STATION LIFE IN NEW ZEALAND, by DR. LEROY M. YALE.
TRAVELING IN AUSTRALIA, by SIDNEY DICKINSON, with illustrations by Birge Harrison. The illustrations in this series are made from original material.

Paris Theatres and Concerts

will be the subject of four articles by W. F. APTHORP. Among the illustrations are some by M. Morand, the artist of the Theatre Francais and himself a playwright.

Rapid Transit in Cities.

Two articles of great importance by MR. THOMAS CURTIS CLARKE, the well-known engineer.

The Nicaragua Canal, Speed on Railways, etc.

Two articles on the NICARAGUA CANAL, the result of a special investigation of the present state of the undertaking, elaborately illustrated. There will be articles on the AUSTRALIAN RAILWAYS (as the only profitably operated government system existing), by D. H. NEALE; on THE SPEED OF LOCOMOTIVES (which is just now attracting special attention), by H. WALTER WEBB; and on the GREAT WATER-WAY FROM CHICAGO TO THE OCEAN, by LIEUT. CHARLES C. ROGERS, U. S. N. Illustrated.

American Illustrators.

A series of articles on modern illustrators, with examples of their work. The group of illustrators, whose work will appear in this series, comprises VEDDER, COX, LOW, FROST, PYLE, BLUM, and others.

The Illustrations

of the Magazine, during the coming year, will be of increased interest and beauty. Not only have the services of the best American artists been enlisted, but also several French painters and illustrators, whose work represents the very highest standard, have been engaged. Among others, CHARLES DELORT, L. MARCHETTI, ALBERT LYNCH, EUGENE MORAND, and many others whose works and names are equally well-known.

Mr. Robert Louis Stevenson

will continue to contribute to the Magazine during 1892. In addition to the serial "THE WRECKER," which is now appearing, there will appear, in an early number, an account of a journey which Mr. Stevenson, the grandfather of the novelist, made with Sir Walter Scott.

QUESTIONS & ANSWERS

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Hafstun Pjettersson, Grund P. O. Manitoba, Can. He may either read his sermons or deliver them without reading, as he prefers. You can get a biography of Dr. Talmage in his book entitled: "The Mask Torn Off," published by Fairbanks & Co., Chicago.

George Rank, Cush Creek, Pa. Where will I find information relative to the stones used in building the temple at Jerusalem, their size, etc?

See Josephus' Wars and Antiquities of the Jews, and Lightfoot's Prospects of the Temple. The former is probably the oldest authority extant.

J. P. A. Do Christ's words in Matt. 12: 32 imply, that sin is forgiven in the world to come?

No; neither in this passage nor in any other does Christ hold out hope that the sinner dying impenitent will be pardoned in the next world. As to this particular sin he declares positively that it cannot be.

Constant Reader, Halifax, N. S. Was Peter converted at the time he denied Christ?

Yes; Christ had previously said to him "Blessed art thou, Simon Barjona," and he had received a revelation. Christ had even predicted his fall and promised to pray for his restoration. The word "restoration" implies a prior state of safety.

W. Hamlin, Alton, Ill. Please explain for me the 29 and 30 verses of the third chapter of I Peter.

The passage referred to is a mysterious one and difficult of interpretation. Many have thought that these people referred to by the Apostle were the people before the Flood and that Christ designed to afford them another opportunity for salvation. This, however, is not an orthodox view.

Jacob C. Baker, Philadelphia. 1. Can a car conductor who works on the Sabbath Day be a Christian? 2. Is it right for a Christian to ride on the cars on the Lord's Day and use them to go to church?

1. A Christian would endeavor to get out of such an occupation as soon as possible, or of any occupation that called for labor on the Sabbath. 2. In extreme cases where it is impossible to reach church otherwise, it may be justifiable. Under all other circumstances, no.

E. F. H., Monmouth, Ill. If St. John was inspired, how do you account for his referring to the "four corners of the earth," when the earth is really round? (Rev. 7: 1.) It would appear to people of our day that he was one of the flat-earth fraternity.

It does not appear that inspiration, in any case, carried with it to the intelligence of the writer a scientific knowledge of physical matters. The Bible writers doubtless supposed the earth was round and that the sun revolved about it. Inspiration only covered the understanding of revelation in spiritual things. It is equally supposable that the Biblical writers were in strict accord with the scientific knowledge of their times.

S. S. Scholar, Brooklyn, L. I. Who first compiled the books of the Old and New Testaments? 2. Who was the first Missionary sent from the United States and in what year? 3. When was the first Missionary Society in the United States organized?

1. It is believed that the work of collecting "the sacred books" was commenced by Ezra in the fifth century before Christ. As the various books were added, subsequent to that time, the question arose whether the books of Esther, Ecclesiastes, Canticles and those now forming the collection known as the Apocrypha should be included in the sacred canon. The Council of Jamnia, which was convened about Dyspepsia seldom causes death, but permits its victim to live on in misery. Hood's Sarsaparilla cures dyspepsia and all stomach disorders. It also cures sick headache and dizziness.

Touring to Washington, D. C., via Pennsylvania Railroad.

The popularity of touring to Washington is thoroughly illustrated by those run under the Pennsylvania Railroad's personally-conducted tourist system. No better medium for reviewing the National Capital exists than these tours, not alone from a point of convenience, but likewise economy.

The next of the season will leave New York foot of Cortlandt and Desbrosses Streets, in a special fast express train November 26th, at 11:00 A. M., reaching Washington early that evening; returning, leave Washington 3:20 P. M. the following Saturday. The round-trip rate of $12.50 includes in addition to railroad fare in both directions, meals en route, accommodations and board at the principal hotels in Washington. The date of the last tour of this series is December 10th.

ninety years after Christ decided to admit the first three and to exclude the Apocrypha. The Councils of Hippo in 393 A. D., and Carthage in 397 A. D., admitted part of the Apocrypha and the Council of Trent in 1546 admitted the whole of it. Since the Reformation, however, the decision of the Council of Jamnia has been accepted by the Protestant Churches. The Canon of the New Testament, as we have it, was settled by the Council of Carthage in 397 A. D. 2. Adoniram Judson who sailed in 1812 is believed to have been the first Protestant Missionary from the United States. 3. In 1810 when the American Board was organized.

James McCall, Chillicothe, O. 1. Who were the pre-Adamites? 2. Where do we find mention of them in the Bible?

1. The Pre-Adamites, so-called, were the supposed inhabitants of the earth anterior to Adam. The projector of this idea was Isaac de la Peyrere, a Calvinist of Bordeaux, who, in the year 1655, published a treatise holding that Adam was the progenitor of the Jewish race, only, and that the Bible is the history of Adam and his descendants. He held that other races existed on the earth before Adam, although no record concerning them remains, and the law of Moses took no account of them whatever. Peyrere also held that as the world "was not then under the law," the Pre-Adamites were guilty only of natural evil. It is proper to add that Peyrere afterward retracted almost all of his speculative opinions. 2. They are mentioned nowhere in the Bible.

E. K. Stauffer, Barry, Ills. Please give a synopsis of Christian Science.

Christian Scientists hold that if the mind is at one with Christ, all merely physical sensations, such as pain, anxiety and care, are nothing and cease to have power over the individual; that the secret of the Science is oneness with Christ and that as soon as this oneness is attained, consciousness of the mere material mind ceases; that one who has the science developed can by the laying on of hands relieve physical suffering; that the material mind and its affairs can, by the exercise of full faith, be practically obliterated and the spiritual mind gradually developed to complete union.

A TRIP UNDERGROUND.

Dr. Talmage Relates his Experiences in the Nunnery Coal Mine—The "Cellars of the Earth"—The "Cage"—Lives Spent away from God's Sweet Sunshine—Where Seven Hundred Miners Toil.

COLORADO last summer, we were invited again and again to descend into mining-shafts. "No! I thank you!" was our invariable answer.

for we had all of underground life we desire one day in England. We accepted an invitation to plunge into the Nunnery Colliery, one of the coal mines near Sheffield. We put on caps and overcoats as protection from the blackness of the coal. Each one is armed with a small lantern. After taking a long breath, in case we should not very soon get another opportunity, we step into what might be called a rough elevator, but which is called "a cage." We stand in the centre and throw our arms over a bar and hold fast.

The sides of the cage are not tightly enclosed, and the only door at the entrance on either side is the body of the guide, who stands there to keep the passengers in their place in case of panic. We are to drop six hundred and sixty feet. About the capacity of the machinery to drop us we have no doubt, but the question is about the sudden halt at the bottom of the mine. With steam power we are lowered, only one rope of steel at the top of the cage deciding whether the three of my party and our two guides shall stop at the foot of the shaft or go on to a landing-place in the next world.

"All right?" asked the men standing on the outside of the cage, with upward inflection of voice.

"All right," answered one of the guides, with downward inflection.

We had suggested to an attendant that we were in no hurry to get to the bottom, and that there were several trains that could take us in time to our next engagement, and therefore we might as well be dropped a little more deliberately than usual. But all that had no effect.

The signal given, down we went. We had the sensation of being parted about the region of the waist-band. We had fallen from hay-mows in boyhood and from apple-trees, and had been swung higher than we wanted to swing, but this was a compression of all those disagreeable feelings into one wrench of the ribs from the hip-bone. We were told it was only a minute, but it must have been a minute stretched six hundred and sixty feet long.

Arriving at the bottom we stepped into an arched room and stopped a few minutes to get our eyes and lungs used to the darkness and the atmosphere. Then one guide ahead and one guide behind, and by the dim light of our lanterns we started through the long black corridors. Past us rushed trains of cars laden with coal. Further and further we went into the darkness, that seemed the more appalling as it parted for a little at the touch of our lights. Beams of wood keep up the roofs of coal, while the sides looked as if any moment large masses might roll down.

This mine, after being worked twelve years shows no signs of exhaustion. Seven hundred men are still plunging their crowbars and pickaxes. This is what does so much to make England great. This is a chilly world, and all nations must have coal. The Duke of Norfolk owns these mines, but all England feels the advantage of this indescribable wealth hidden in the cellars of the earth.

Talking with the miners, they all seem cheerful and unharmed by the eternal shadows in which so much of their lives are spent. They pass eight hours in the mine, and then have sixteen hours out. A stout, tall miner by the name of Henry Walters told us that he had been working in the mines forty-five years. There are few men toiling above ground who look as healthy as this man, for nearly half a century toiling underground. But it is a hard life anyway you make it. Standing down here amid the foundations of the earth, the memories of colliery accidents at Blantyre, and Rizca, and Hartley, came shuddering and groaning through the wilderness of underground night. It will take the resounding blast of archangelic trumpet to fetch up the bodies of the miners from such entombment.

sands of men spend their lives in the midnight, hewing more midnight from the sides of the caverns? But how suggestive that out of these chunks of darkness that tumble to the miner's feet we secure warmth and light for our homes, and momentum for our steamships. The brightest light of this world we chip out of its darkness. Out of our own trials we get warmth of sympathy for others. Our past troubles are the black fuel which we heave into the furnace of future enterprises. As the miners cut the wealth of England out of the caverns, so we may hew out of the midnight caverns of misfortune the brightest treasures of character and usefulness.

But we must say good-bye to these underground workers. We get into the "cage" and prepare for ascent. The guides warn us that as we near the top and the speed of the "cage" is slackened, the sensation will be somewhat distressing. Sure enough! We get aboard, throw our arms over the iron bar with a stout hug; the signal of "all ready" being given we fly upward. Coming near the top at the slackening speed it seems as if the rope must have broken and that we are dropping to the bottom of the mine. A few slight "ohs," and the delusion passes, and we are in the sunlight. Bless God for this heavenly mixture! There is nothing like it. No artifice can successfully imitate it. You need to spend a few hours deep down in a mine to appreciate it. In the contrast it seems more mellow, more golden, more entrancing. You take off your hat and bathe in it. You feel that the world needs more of it. Sunshine for the body. Sunshine for the mind. Sunshine for the soul. Sunshine of earth. Sunshine of heaven. In the words of the old philosopher, "stand out of my sunshine!" trous. Wonderful transformation! The carbon becomes the solitaire. When God wants jewelry he comes down and digs it out of the depths of darkness and sin. These souls are the crystallization of mercy and he puts them on and wears them in the presence of the whole universe. The coal makes no resistance. It hears the resurrection voice in the mountain and it comes to crystallization, but the heart resists. The trouble with you, my brother, is the coal wants to stay coal. Give sin full chance in your heart and the transformation will be downward instead of upward. Instead of a crystal it will be a cinder. Charred ruin instead of glorious crystallization.

Look here! We are up out of the mine, and what do we want any more of these miners' lamps? They might as well be extinguished. Their faint flicker is absurd in the face of the noon-day. They were useful to show us where to tread among the seams of coal. They were good to light up the genial faces of the miners while we talked to them about their wages and their families. Lamps are valuable in a mine. But blow them out, now that we stand under the chandelier which at twelve o'clock at noon, hangs pendent from the frescoed dome of these blue heavens.

So all the tallow dips of earthly joy will be submerged when the Old Belfry of the next world strikes twelve for celestial noon. Departure from this world for the good will be only getting out of the hard-working mine of earthly fatigues into the everlasting radiance of Edenic mid-summer. Come now! Stop moralizing and drop that lantern of the collieries.

T. De Witt Talmage

"WE STARTED THROUGH THE LONG, BLACK CORRIDORS."

For four shillings a day, which of us would like this banishment from the sunshine? A sepulchre is not inviting, whether built out of coal or limestone. Sitting and walking all day long in the light that bathes the streets and fields, or streams through our windows, do we realize sympathetically how many thou-

The diamond is only a crystallization of coal. Carbonate of lime rises till it becomes calcite or aragonite. Red oxide of copper crystallizes unto cubes and octahedrons. # THE TABERNACLE PULPIT

ANOTHER ANTHEM.

DR. TALMAGE'S latest Sunday morning sermon, preached amid the emblems of the bountiful harvest with which the Tabernacle had been decorated for Thanksgiving Day, and which remained in their places. Cotton, rice, wheat, sugar-cane, rye, oats, corn and products of North, South, East and West were on the platform and on the fronts of the galleries. Dr. Talmage's text was: "Beasts and all cattle; creeping things and flying fowl: both young men and maidens; old men and children; let them praise the name of the Lord." Ps. 148: 10, 12, 13.

WHAT a scene it was when last Thursday at the call of the President and Governors, this nation assembled to chant the praises of God! But the day was too short to celebrate the Divine goodness of such a year. The sun did not rise over Brooklyn until one minute before seven o'clock that morning, and it set four o'clock and thirty-five minutes that evening. What a small space of time in which to meditate upon twelve months of benefactions. So I add to that day this Sabbath morning service, and with the fruits and harvests of the earth still glorifying the pulpit and the galleries, ask you to continue the rehearsal of the Divine goodness.

By a sublime egotism man has come to appropriate this world to himself, when the fact is that our race is in a small minority. The instances of human life, as compared with the instances of animal life, are not one to a million. We shall enlarge our ideas of God's goodness and come to a better understanding of the text if, before we come to look at the cup of our blessing, we look at the goodness of God to the irrational creation.

Although nature is out of joint, yet even in its disruption I am surprised to find the almost universal happiness of the animal creation. On a summer day, when the air and the grass are most populous with life, you will not hear a sound of distress unless, perchance, a heartless school-boy has robbed a bird's nest, or a hunter has broken a bird's wing, or a pasture has been robbed of a lamb, and there goes up a bleating from the flocks. The whole earth is filled with animal delight—joy feathered, and scaled, and horned, and hoofed. The bee hums it; the frog croaks it; the squirrel chatters it; the quail whistles it; the lark carols it; the whale spouts it. The snail, the rhinoceros, the grizzly bear, the toad, the wasp, the spider, the shell-fish, have their homely delights—joy as great to them as our joy is to us. Goat climbing the rocks; anaconda crawling through the jungle; buffalo plunging across the prairie; crocodile basking in tropical sun; seal puffing on the ice; ostrich striding across the desert, are so many bundles of joy; they do not go moping or melancholy; they are not only half supplied; God says they are filled with good.

The worm squirming through the sod upturned of plowshare, and the ants racing up and down the hillock, are happy by day and happy by night. Take up a drop of water under the microscope, and you find that within it there are millions of creatures that swim in a hallelujah of gladness. The sounds in nature that are repulsive to our ears are often only utterances of joy—the growl, the croak, the bark, the howl. The good God made these creatures, thinks of them ever, and will not let a plowshare turn up a mole's nest, or fisherman's hook transfix a worm, until, by eternal decree, its time has come. God's hand feeds all these broods, and shepherds all these flocks, and tends all these herds. He sweetens the clover-top for the oxen's taste; and pours out crystalline waters, in mossed cups of rock, for the hind to drink out of on his way down the crags, and pours nectar into the cup of the honeysuckle to refresh the humming-bird; and spreads a banquet of a hundred fields of buckwheat, and lets the honey-bee put his mouth to any cup of all the banquet and tells the grasshopper to go anywhere he likes, and gives the flocks of heaven the choice of all the grain-fields. The sea anemone, half animal, half flower, clinging to the rock in mid-ocean, with its tentacles spread to catch its food, has the Owner of the universe to provide for it. We are repulsed at the hideousness of the elephant, but God, for the comfort and convenience of the monster, puts forty thousand distinct muscles in its proboscis.

I go down on the barren sea-shore and say, "No animal can live in this place of desolation;" but all through the sands are myriads of little insects that leap with happy life. I go down by the marsh and say, "In this damp place, and in these loathsome pools of stagnant water, there will be the quietness of death;" but, lo! I see the turtles on the rotten log sunning themselves, and hear the bogs quake with multitudinous life. When the unfledged robins are hungry, God shows the old robin where she can get food to put into their open mouths. Winter is not allowed to come until the ants have granaried their harvest, and the squirrels have filled their cellar with nuts. God shows the hungry ichneumon where it may find the crocodile's eggs; and in arctic climes there are animals that God so lavishly clothes that they can afford to walk through snow-storms in the finest sable, and ermine, and chinchilla, and no sooner is one set of furs worn out than God gives them a new one. He helps the spider in its architecture of its gossamer bridge, and takes care of the color of the butterfly's wing, and tinges the cochineal, and helps the moth out of the chrysalis. The animal creation also has its army and navy. The most insignificant has its means of defense: the wasp its sting; the reptile its tooth; the bear its paw; the dog its muzzle; the elephant its tusk; the fish its scale; the bird its swift wing; the reindeer its antlers; the roe its fleet foot. We are repelled at the thought of sting, and tusk, and hoof, but God's goodness provides them for the defense of the animal's rights.

Yea, God in the Bible announces his care for these orders of creation. He says that he has heaved up fortifications for their defense—Psalm civ., 18: "The high hills are a refuge for the wild goats, and the rocks for the conies." He watches the bird's nest—Psalm civ., 17: "As for the stork, the fir-trees are her house." He sees that the cattle have enough grass—Psalm civ., 14: "He causeth the grass to grow for the cattle." He sees to it that the cows, and sheep, and horses have enough to drink—Psalm civ., 10:11; "He sendeth the springs into the valleys, which run among the hills; they give drink to every beast of the field; the wild asses quench their thirst."

Amid the thunders of Sinai God uttered the rights of cattle, and said that they should have a Sabbath. "Thou shalt not do any work, thou, nor thy cattle." He declared with infinite emphasis that the ox on the threshing-floor should have the privilege of eating some of the grain as he trod it out, and muzzling was forbidden. If young birds were taken from the nest for food, the despoiler's life depended on the mother going free. God would not let the mother-bird suffer in one day the loss of her young and her own liberty. And he who regarded in olden time the conduct of man toward the brutes, to-day looks down from heaven and is interested in every minnow that swims the stream, and every rook that cleaves the air, and every herd that bleats, or neighs, or lows in the pasture.

Why did God make all these, and why make them so happy? How account for all this singing, and dancing, and frisking amid the irrational creation? Why this heaven for the animal-cule in a dewdrop? Why for the condor a throne on Chimborazo? Why the glitter of the phosphorus in the ship's wake on the sea, which is said to be only the frolic of millions of insects? Why the perpetual chanting of so many voices from the irrational creation in earth, and air, and ocean—beasts, and all cattle, creeping things, and flying fowl, permitted to join in the praise that goes up from seraph and archangel? Only one solution, one explanation, one answer—God is good. "The earth is full of the goodness of the Lord."

I take a step higher, and notice the adaptation of the world to the comfort and happiness of man. The sixth day of creation had arrived. The palace of the world was made, but there was no king to live in it. Leviathan ruled the deep; the eagle the air; the lion the field; but where was the sceptre which should rule all? A new style of being was created. Heaven and earth were represented in his nature. His body from the earth beneath; his soul from the heaven above. The one reminding him of his origin, the other speaking of his destiny—himself the connecting link between the animal creation and angelic intelligence. In him a strange commingling of the temporal and eternal, the finite and the infinite, dust and glory. The earth for his floor, and heaven for his roof; God for his Father; eternity for his lifetime.

The Christian anatomist, gazing upon the conformation of the human body, exclaims; "Fearfully and wonderfully made." No embroidery so elaborate, no gauze so delicate, no color so exquisite, no mechanism so graceful, no handiwork so divine. So quietly and mysteriously does the human body perform its functions, that it was not until five thousand years after the creation of the race that the circulation of the blood was discovered; and though anatomists of all countries and ages have been so long exploring this castle of life, they have only begun to understand it.

Volumes have been written of the hand. Wondrous instrument! With it we give friendly recognition, and grasp the sword, and climb the rock, and write, and carve, and build. It constructed the Pyramids, and hoisted the Parthenon. It made the harp, and then struck out of it all the world's minstrelsy. In it the white marble of Pentelicon mines dreamed itself away into immortal sculpture. It reins in the swift engine; it holds the steamer to its path in the sea; it snatches the fire from heaven; it feels the pulse of the sick child with its delicate touch, and makes the nations quake with its stupendous achievements. What power brought down the forests, and made the marshes blossom, and burdened the earth with all the cities that thunder on with enterprise and power? Four fingers and a thumb. A hundred million dollars would not purchase for you a machine as exquisite and wonderful as your own hand. Mighty hand! In all its bones, and muscles, and joints, I learn that God is good.

Behold the eye, which, in its photographic gallery, in an instant catches the mountain and the sea. This perpetual telegraphing of the nerves; these joints, that are the only hinges that do not wear out; these bones and muscles of the body, with fourteen thousand different adaptations; these one hundred thousand glands; these two hundred million pores; this mysterious heart, contracting four thousand times every hour—this chemical process of digestion; this laboratory, beyond the understanding of the most skillful philosophy; this furnace, whose heat is kept up from cradle to grave; this factory of life, whose wheels, and spindles, and bands are God-directed. If we could realize the wonders of our physical organization, we would be hypochondriacs, fearing every moment that some part of the machine would break down. But there are men here who have lived through seventy years, and not a nerve has ceased to thrill, or a muscle to contract, or a lung to breathe, or a hand to manipulate.

I take a step higher, and look at man's mental constitution. Behold the benevolence of God in powers of perception, or the faculty of transporting this outside world into your own mind—gathering into your brain the majesty of the storm, and the splendors of the day-dawn, and lifting into your mind the ocean as easily as you might put a glass of water to your lips.

Watch the law of association, or the mysterious linking together of all you ever thought, or knew, or felt, and then giving you the power to take hold of the clue-line, and draw through your mind the long train with indescribable velocity—one thought starting up a hundred, and this again a thousand—as the chirp of one bird sometimes wakes a whole forest of voices, or the thrum of one string will rouse an orchestra.

Watch your memory—that sheaf-binder, that goes forth to gather the harvest and discovers that there are hundreds of thousands of animalculæ living, moving, working, dying within a circle that could be covered with the point of a pin—animals to which a rain-drop would be an ocean, a rose-leaf a hemisphere, and the flash of a fire-fly lasting enough to give them light to several generations.

I take a step higher, and look at man's moral nature. Made in the image of God. Vast capacity for enjoyment; capable at first of eternal joy, and, though now disordered, still, through the recuperative force of heavenly grace, able to mount up to more than its original felicity: faculties that may blossom and bear fruit inexhaustibly. Immortality written upon every capacity: a soul destined to range in unlimited spheres of activity long after the world has put on ashes, and the solar system shall have snapped its axle, and the stars that, in their courses, fought against Sisera, shall have been slain, and buried amid the tolling thunders of the last day.

You see that God has adapted everything to our comfort and advantage. Pleasant things for the palate; music for the ear; beauty for the eye; aroma for the nostril; kindred for our affections; poetry for our taste; religion for our soul. We are put in a garden, and told that from all the trees we may eat except here and there one. He gives the sun to shine on us, and the waters to refresh us, and food to strengthen us; and the herbs yield medicine when we are sick, and the forests lumber when we would build a house, or cross the water in a ship. The rocks are transported for our foundation; and metals upturned for our currency; and wild beasts must give us covering; and the mountains must be tunneled to let us pass; and the fish of the sea come up in our net; and the birds of the air drop at the flash of our guns; and the cattle on a thousand hills come down to give us meat. For us the peach-orchards bend down their fruit, and the vineyards their purple clusters. To feed and refresh our intellect, ten thousand wonders in nature and providence—wonders of mind and body, wonders of earth, and air, and deep analogies and antitheses; all colors and sounds; lyrics in the air; idyls in the field; conflagrations in the sunset; robes of mist on the mountains; and the "Grand March" of God in the storm.

But for the soul still higher adaptation: a fountain in which it may wash; a ladder by which it may climb; a song of endless triumph that it may sing; a crown of unfading light that it may wear. Christ came to save it—came with a cross on his back; came with spikes in his feet; came when no one else would come, to do a work which no one else would do. See how suited to man's condition is what God has done for him! Man is a sinner; here is pardon. He has lost God's image; Christ retraces it. He is helpless; Almighty grace is proffered. He is a lost wanderer; Jesus brings him home. He is blind; and at one touch of him who cured Bartimeus, eternal glories stream into his soul. Jesus, I sing thy grace! Cure of worst disease! Hammer to smite off heaviest chain! Light for thickest darkness! Grace divine! Devils scoff at it, and men reject it, but heaven celebrates it!

I wish you good cheer for the national health. Pestilence, that in other years has come to drive out its thousand hearers to Greenwood and Laurel Hill, has not visited our nation. It is a glorious thing to be well. How strange that we should keep our health when one breath from a marsh, or the sting of an insect, or the slipping of a foot, or the falling of a tree-branch might fatally assault our life! Regularly the lungs work, and their motion seems to be a spirit within us panting after its immortality. Our sight fails not, though the air is so full of objects which by one touch could break out the soul's window. What ship, after a year's tossing on the sea, could come in with so little damage as ourselves, though we arrive after a year's voyage to-day?

I wish you good cheer for the national harvest. Reaping machines never swathed thicker rye, and corn-husker's peg never ripped out fuller ear, and mow-poles never bent down under sweeter hay, and wind-mill's hopper never shook out larger wheat. Long trains of white-covered wagons have brought the wealth down to the great thoroughfares. The garner are full, the store-houses are overcrowded, the canals are blocked with freights pressing down to the mallets. The cars rumble all through the darkness, and whistle up the flagman at dead of night to let the Western harvests come down to feed the mouths of the great cities. A race of kings has taken possession of this land—King Cotton, King Corn, King Wheat, King Rice, King Grass, King Coal.

I wish you good cheer for civil and religious liberty. No official spy watches our entrance here, nor does an armed soldier interfere with the honest utterance of truth. We stand here to-day with our arms free to work, and our tongues free to speak. This Bible—it is all unclashed. This pulpit—there is no chain around about it. There is no snap-

A CRISIS IN A CHURCH.

Fire in the Breakers of a Coal Mine Impoverishes the Members of a Baptist Church.

PATHETIC story of a church's need comes from the mining village of Kingston, Pa. There is a Baptist Church there which has been doing valuable work. It was organized in 1886 and its membership and congregation were drawn from the miners and their families. One by one a small company of saved men was gathered, and they brought in others until their was the nucleus of a church. They put aside from their scanty earnings money toward the building fund for a church home. A little assistance was received from outside and eventually, in 1886 the church was erected and dedicated.

The church grew and prospered, souls were saved and a hopeful mission work radiated from that centre. The Church called the Rev. T. E. Richards to the pastorate. He was then engaged in City Mission work in New York. His education for the ministry had been obtained in England under the superintendence of Pastor C. H. Spurgeon, by whom he was strongly recommended as an able, earnest, devoted worker. He accepted the call and has been laboring there for upwards of three years. The portrait of Mr. Richards is at the head of this column.

About a month ago a heavy misfortune befell the members of the little church. Nearly all of them were employed in the mines and the work of the majority was on the great "breakers," where the coal passes between the rollers and is broken and screened ready for sale. These breakers are gigantic contrivances as will be seen from the accompanying illustration which is reproduced from a ping of musketry in the street. Blessed be God that to-day we are free men, with the prospect and determination of always being free. No established religion: Jew and Gentile—Arminian and Calvinist—Trinitarian and Unitarian—Protestant and Roman Catholic—on the same footing. If persecution should come against the most unpopular of all the sects, I believe that all other denominations would band together, and arm themselves, and hearts would be stout, and blood would be free, and the right of men to worship God according to the dictates of their consciences would be contested at the point of the bayonet, and with blood flowing up to the bits of the horses' bridles.

For mercies temporal and spiritual let consecrated lives be offered. Wherever God's light shines and God's rain descends, and God's mercy broods, let the thanksgiving arise!

HOME.

THERE lies a little city in the hills,
White are its roofs, dim is each dwelling's door,
A peace with perfect rest its bosom fills.

There the pure mist, the pity of the sea,
Comes as a white, soft hand, and reaches o'er
And touches its still face most tenderly.

Unstirred and calm, amid our shifting years,
Lo! where it lies, far from the clash and roar
With quiet distance blurred, as if thro' tears.
O heart, that prayest so for God to send
Some loving messenger to go before
And lead the way to where thy longings end.

Be sure, be very sure, that soon will come
His kindest angel, and through that still door
Into infinite love will lead thee home.

photograph. About midsummer of this year a fire broke out and two of the breakers were burned. Work, of course, was immediately suspended, and no less than fifteen hundred persons were thrown out of employment. Contributions to the church are of necessity discontinued. Mr. Richards has been urged to leave the church and seek a pastorate elsewhere, but he has cast in his lot with his people, and is resolved to stay with them in their trouble, when they most need his ministrations. Mr. Richards is not afraid of the hardships he must endure during the three or four months which must elapse before the burned breakers are rebuilt. What, however, does give him and his people anxiety is the debt on the church. He asks help in this matter. If he can obtain money to pay the interest for a time until the people are able to take up the burden, all will be well, otherwise the church is in danger of foreclosure. If any of our readers are willing to help in the crisis, and will send contributions to this office we will forward them.

of the past, and bring it into the present. Your power and velocity of thought—thought of the swift wing and the lightning foot; thought that outspeeds the star, and circles through the heavens, and weighs worlds, and, from poising amid wheeling constellations, comes down to count the blossoms in a tuft of mignonette, then starts again to try the fathoming of the bottomless, and the scaling of the insurmountable, to be swallowed up in the incomprehensible, and lost in God!

In reason and understanding, man is alone. The ox surpasses him in strength the antelope in speed, the hound in keenness of nostril, the eagle in far-reaching sight, the rabbit in quickness of hearing, the honey-bee in delicacy of tongue, the spider in fineness of touch. Man's power, therefore, consisteth not in what he can lift, or how fast he can run, or how strong a wrestler he can throw—for in these respects the ox, the ostrich, and the hyena are his superior—but by his reason he comes forth to rule all: through his ingenious contrivance to outrun, outlift, outwrestle, outsee, outhear, outdo. At his all-conquering decree, the forest that had stood for ages steps aside to let him build his cabin and cultivate his farm. The sea which raved and foamed upon the race has become a crystal pathway for commerce to march on. The thunder-cloud that slept lazily above the mountain is made to come down and carry mail-bags. Man, dissatisfied with his slowness of advancement, shouted to the Water and the Fire, "Come and lift!" "Come and draw!" "Come and help!" And they answered, "Ay, ay, we come;" and they joined hands—the fire and the water—and the shuttles fly, and the rail-train rattles on, and the steamship comes coughing, panting, flaming across the deep. He elevates the telescope to the heavens, and, as easily as through the stethoscope the physician hears the movement of the lung, the astronomer catches the pulsation of distant systems of worlds throbbing with life. ## CHRIST RISEN.

S. S. Lesson For Dec. 13. By Mrs M. Baxter
John 20: 1-18. Golden Text, Rom. 8: 34.

THE disciples of Jesus never understood, till they were filled with the Holy Ghost, the great truth of the resurrection. In vain had he taught them that he must suffer, and be killed, and be raised again the third day. Peter saw in such an announcement only something to be avoided, and his carnal heart said, "Pity thyself, Lord, this shall not be unto thee." (Matt. 16: 21, 22.) And when, after his transfiguration, Jesus charged them that they should tell no man what things they had seen, until the Son of Man had risen from the dead, "they kept that saying with themselves," questioning one with another what the raising from the dead should mean. Even Martha, the sister of Lazarus, did not understand him when he said, "I am the Resurrection and the Life: he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live, and he that liveth and believeth in me shall never die." (John 11: 25, 26.) His declaration, "If a man keep my saying, he shall never taste of death," only stirred up the anger of the Jews to the point of stoning him. And when the Sadducees questioned him about a woman who should, according to the Jewish law, become the wife of seven brethren in succession, no light dawned upon them from the answer, so full of wondrous truth; "The children of this world (or age) marry and are given in marriage; but they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that (age) and the resurrection from the dead, neither marry nor are given in marriage: neither can they die any more; for they are equal unto the angels; and are the children of God, being the ### Children of the Resurrection."

It is no wonder then that when Joseph of Arimathea and Nicodemus obtained possession of the body of Jesus, all their arrangements were made for the continuance of his body in the grave—myrrh, aloes, winding sheet, all spoke of death, and no sign appeared of any expectation that he should rise again. And yet, when once the Holy Ghost had fully taken possession of the disciples, "Jesus and the resurrection" was their one universal, unwearied theme. However far the disciples had mentally received the truth of the resurrection of their Lord, it is very evident that it had not become a practical reality to them, or they would have anticipated it, and not been stumbled by the judgment and the cross.

But there was one woman who, having once learned of Jesus, could find no rest elsewhere. With the other women, Mary Magdalene had "rested the Sabbath day according to the commandment" but without the other women, she came, on the first day of the week,

"While it was yet Dark,"

waiting neither for light nor for companionship to the sepulchre. A woman out of whom had been cast seven devils, felt her need of nearness to a crucified Saviour. It is such as follow Jesus even to the grave through reproach and alone, without waiting for the fellowship even of the nearest and dearest, who understand "the power of his resurrection and the fellowship of his sufferings." Theirs is a life out of death; death to all which seems gain on earth. Mary's conceptions were not yet enlightened by an indwelling Holy Ghost: she looked only for a dead Saviour, helpless in the tomb.

The first glimmer of light discovered to her what she had not expected—the stone was taken away, the tomb was open and empty! He whom she had sought was not there. She could run now, dark as it was, to tell the disciples, Peter and John, "They have taken away the Lord out of the sepulchre, and we know not where they have laid him." Did it never strike her that he was risen? Could she not connect the empty tomb and the displaced stone with his own repeated words about his resurrection? O how slow of heart we are to believe! O how prone our hearts are to rest in what we have experience, in the region of earthly things, rather than heavenly! Peter and John run to the sepulchre, investigate, and find all there but the body of the Lord; linen clothes and napkin, neatly folded as though the tenant of the sepulchre had departed quietly, and John "saw and believed." Having made their investigation, both of them, John as well as Peter judged there was nothing more to be done, and "they went away to their own home." But Mary could not go away, she was in no hurry to leave the place, a mystery was before her and she gave time to think of it. Peter and John might have been the first witnesses to the resurrection of Jesus if they could have had patience. "Blessed are all they that wait for him." "The two disciples went away unto their home;" no home claim drew Mary from the sepulchre. Mary understood what Martha did not—that listening and taking in what he had to teach was the hospitality which Jesus craves beyond all else from his own.

Mary could not understand, but she could wait, her home was the presence of her Lord. The Holy Ghost was not yet given, Mary was at sea, the Shepherd was gone, the Comforter had not come, what could she do but weep! Blessed are they who cannot live independently of their Lord, who cannot take a step alone, whose life is meaningless except as it is filled, directed, empowered by God. As she wept, she stooped and looked into the tomb. It was no casual glance, she gave time for God to focus her eyes to the things of heaven, and she saw "two angels in white sitting, the one at the head and the other at the feet, where the body of Jesus had lain." Life in the tomb, heaven's messengers where earth's hopes failed, such was the reward of the patiently waiting one. God takes time to make his children conscious of heavenly things; they who are always in a hurry have senses more open to earth than heaven, to man than God.

"Women, why weepeth thou?" "Because they have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid him." It was the angels who asked the question which called forth this despondent answer. Then she turned herself, and saw one whom she supposed to be the gardener, but Mary knew not how God was filling her vision more than she was aware with that which earthly eyes were dull to perceive. The stranger asked her the same question: "Woman why weepeth thou? whom seekest thou?" "Sir," she answered, "if thou hast borne him hence, tell me where thou hast laid him, and I will bear him away." A weak woman bear the corpse of a strong man! But Mary saw no impossibilities. If she could see again only the corpse of her Lord, she would be satisfied. Jesus living or Jesus dead she must have. One word recalled her—"Mary!" It was the voice of Jesus, and all her soul, all her faith, her love, the surrender of her whole being, went out in that one word, "Rabboni, Master." Thus Mary learned the truth of the resurrection.

To be crucified with Christ is our daily lesson—not only saved by his cross, but nailed to his cross, by which the world is crucified to us, and we unto the world. (Gal. 6: 14.) But every death to our will, our plans, our hopes, our purposes, our self-life, is a resurrection.

God Brings Life out of Death,

but they who are tired of the tomb, and go away to their own home, or their own work, or their own thoughts, in a critical moment, when God is closely dealing with them, come much more slowly to the resurrection. Resurrection is really life which cannot die, coming in on the death of the life that can die; it is the divine taking the place of the human. "Buried with him in baptism, wherein also ye are risen with him through faith of the operation of God, which hath raised him from the dead." (Col. 2: 12.) Faith in God's working, looking only from the human to the divine,—this is our preparation in everything for resurrection, and there is a death and resurrection going on in all our lives. Everything which is of man must pass through death, through disappointment; "that no flesh should glory in his presence."

Jesus put Mary to the test. "Rabboni," if it meant anything, must mean that he should have his way, and that she was at the disposal of her risen Lord. "Touch me not, for I am not yet ascended to my Father." "But go to my brethren, and say unto them. I ascend to my Father and to your Father," to my God and your God." Mary was rewarded; separated from her own life and her own self-satisfaction, her Master revealed to her the wondrous relationship to God which is the resurrection following on a practical death to the life of self. "My Father and your Father," for you and I are one; "my God and your God;" and he spoke of ascending. Heaven was opening to Mary as she let go earth and time, and sense; fellowship with Jesus was dawning upon her in a wondrous way; the Master became the Brother, and yet her God, and Mary, through the shed blood of her Lord and his resurrection, became a citizen of heaven!

Shall we, must we, be so immersed in the things of time and sense, our own home, our own work, our own family, our own reputation, that Jesus will be unable to unveil to us the joint heirship with him which he has purchased for us? Mary was in a new world; leaving her Lord without regret, because his will was dearer to her than her own. She came and told the disciples that she had seen the Lord, and that he had said these things unto her." Thus was Mary the first witness of the resurrection.

LESSON POINTS,

Especially Adapted to the Requirements of the Desk.

So they ran both together. There is an energy about agility that will often give a man a fortitude which he might otherwise not have possessed. We can picture the gallant regiment at Balaclava, riding into the valley of death at a dashing gallop, but we could scarcely imagine their marching slowly up to the guns, coolly calculating all the deadly odds of the adventure. There is much in enthusiasm and zeal in the Lord's service, and it is well at times to "run with alacrity." First thoughts are best in the service of God, they are like Gideon's men that lapped. Second thoughts come up timorously and limpingly, and incite us to make provision for the flesh. They are like those men whom Gideon discarded because they went down on their knees to drink. They took things too leisurely to be fit for the Lord's battles.

The late Dr. Arnot used to tell a story of his being at a Scotch railway station where he grew weary of waiting for the train to move. He inquired of one of the trainmen what the trouble was, and asked if it was want of water? "Plenty of water," was the prompt reply, "but it's no' biling." We have no lack of religious machinery in church and Sabbath school. The engines are on the track and the trainmen are in their places; and if there is little or no progress may it not be because the water is "no' biling!"

"It does my soul good," said Mr. Beecher, one night at Prayer meeting, "to hear such cheerful testimonials to the value of Christ's presence and blessing in affliction. At night, when a railroad train, having stopped at a station, is about to start again, in order that the conductor may know that everything is as it should be, the brakeman on the last car calls out through the darkness, 'All right here!' and the next man takes up the word, 'All right here!' and the next echoes, 'All right here!' and so it passes along the line full of reassurance for everybody, and the train passes on."

It is Christ that died, yea, rather that is risen again. Our Golden Text is only part of a verse, and it certainly is very fragmentary. In the full verse, the Apostle Paul boldly asks "who is he that condemneth?" and then he volunteers the answer, full of hope and peace and comfort: "It is Christ that died, yea, rather that is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us." What then have we to fear when he who is our risen Saviour is both Advocate and Judge?

A woman deeply convinced of sin came to her minister and producing a handful of sand said: "Do you see this, sir?" "Yes," said he, "it's sand." "But do you know what it means?" "I do not know exactly what you mean by it. What is it?" "Ah, sir," said she, "that's me, and the number of my sins they cannot be counted." And then she exclaimed: "Oh, wretched creature that I am! How can such a wretch as I ever be saved?" "Where did you get the sand?" asked the minister. "At the beach." "Go back then to the beach, take a spade with you, dig, dig, dig, and raise a great mound, shovel it as high as ever you can, and leave it there. Then take your stand by the sea shore and watch the effects of the waves upon the sand." "Oh, sir," she exclaimed, "I see what you mean—the blood—the blood of Christ; it would wash it all away."

KIOLANI'S ORDEAL.

A Story of the Sunday School Golden Text for Dec. 13. Romans 8: 34.

*A*MONG the lands that have come out of the darkness of idolatry and superstition to the light of the Gospel, few are more beautiful than the Sandwich Islands in the Pacific Ocean. These islands are in great part volcanic formations, and two lofty peaks, each two and a half miles high, that rise on the horizon and attract the eye from afar, stand as huge and terrible reminders of a time when twin volcanoes poured forth torrents of liquid fire, consuming and obliterating everything from shore to shore. One is silent now, and its peak is white with perpetual snow, but the other is ominously dark, its sides seamed and scored with lava and bedded with cinders. This is Kileaua, one of the most active volcanoes in the world. Its crater is a mass of flame, from six to nine miles in circumference, and above the summit hangs a continual vapor which at night shows fiery red, reflecting on the sky the furnace within the bosom of the mountain.

When the Christian missionaries first came to Hawaii, they found the islanders in dread of a goddess whom they named Pele, and whom they believed to be the deity of the burning mountain. Within the seething crater of Kileaua, Pele dwelt, so the heathen priests taught, and the shining strands of lava that overflowed and streamed down the sides of the volcano were the glossy threads of the goddess's hair. She was terrible in her wrath, and while she permitted the priests and occasionally some favored Hawaiian to climb Kileaua's rocky sides, no woman might venture the ascent. The moment a female foot touched the lower verge of the mountain, Pele's wrath would break out and involve the island in general destruction.

Such was the superstitious bondage in which the good missionaries found the islanders. Many of them gradually became convinced of the folly and wickedness of this heathen worship, and adopted the Christian belief, but the cloud of superstition still hung around Kileaua, and a very large majority of the Hawaiians clung to their idolatrous worship of the goddess, and trusted implicitly in the crafty priests.

It was in this crisis that a brave Christian woman, Kiolani, the wife of Naihe, a chief of the nation, and the leading public orator of the kingdom, was inspired to undertake the redemption of her country from heathenism. This could only be done by boldly attacking their superstitions in their very stronghold—the Temple of Pele. Thousands of men had been slain by the goddess—so the priests declared—and so the islanders, knowing only that their brothers had perished, believed. No woman had ever dared to offend this goddess by attempting the ascent of Kileaua; the few who had touched the lowest verge of the mountain had been struck dead by Pele's breath.

"It is madness!" urged the little band of Kiolani's Christian friends. "Even if you escape the angry priests, Pele will surely slay you."

"I will trust in the One true Maker of Heaven and earth," was the brave reply.

"You cannot hope to reach her temple, where the terrible sights and sounds would overcome you," they still pleaded. "Stay and live. Her hair will strangle you; you will perish on the wild crags, and the slippery sheets of burning lava, or be choked amid the cinders or buried in the heated soil. Besides, no one can live in the vapor of the sacred mountain. The goddess will surely punish a trespasser."

"I must go," replied Kiolani resolutely, as with folded and prayerful hands she faced her entreating friends. "See, Lauani, I have the sacred berries. Our priests tell us it is forbidden to touch them and that for a woman to place them on Pele's lips would mean death for all her kindred."

With frightened faces, the men shrank back from Kiolani. Lauani, her friend, fell at her feet, and with eyes flowing with tears, added reproaches to entreaties.

"I am in God's hands, my friends," said Kiolani, as she rose to make her final preparation for the journey.

Already the priests, ever suspicious of the Christians, had been informed of her determination. Enraged beyond measure at the woman's daring, and terror-stricken at the prospect of losing their influence with the people, they emerged from their sanctuary among the crags in force and barred the way with threats and warnings. They mocked at Kiolani and predicted that Pele would surely kill her; but she was soon far up the mountain's side, not even turning back to wave farewell to the friends who stood below, disconsolately mourning her as one already given over to the wrath of the goddess.

Many hours passed and a thick veil hung over Kileaua's summit. The sun went down and the sky above reflected the lurid fire that hissed and danced in the crater. One by one, the mourners in the valley left their places and went sadly to their huts, deeming Kiolani no more. The priests smiled at each other and wagged their heads, and said that Pele had claimed another sacrifice. And darkness settled over Hawaii.

It was gray dawn when Naihe, with Lauani and another, sought the foot of Kileaua. All three had passed a sleepless night. They met together and spoke tenderly of the excellences of the one who had gone from them. Naihe lifted his strained eyes to Kileaua, and there, half-way down the mountain's side, descried his beloved wife, Kiolani. With a shout of delight and a fervent exclamation of thanks to God, he ran forward to meet her. At the same instant the two friends also observed her, and while Lauani followed in Naihe's footsteps up the craggy sides of Kileaua, the other sped down to the village and, ere the reunited husband and wife had reached the base of the mountain, hundreds of people had hastily gathered to verify the strange report of Kiolani's return. The clamor aroused the priests and they, too, came down from their rocky sanctuary, greatly troubled at this wonder.

"Kiolani has come back from the dead!" was the cry of the people. "She has been up within the sacred circle of fire, and has braved the wrath of Pele."

And they surrounded Kiolani on every side and kept the priests back, till the wanderer who had thus passed from death to life should tell of her adventure.

"Let the priests come forward," cried Kiolani, firmly. "This message is from a greater than Pele, whom they worship; it is from the Ever-living God. Let them see for themselves that Pele had no power to slay me, as they foretold; that I have indeed, with God's help, been in the crater of Kileaua and am here alive. I have seen the fiery gulf and have cast the sacred berries into the sea of flame, while I cried, 'If I perish by Pele's wrath, then let my people dread her power; but if I live and return safe, then let them know that Jehovah the Almighty is our God, and that his breath kindled these flames and his hand restrains their fury. O, all ye people of Hawaii, behold how vain are the gods of your priests and how vain the worship ye pay to Pele, and turn and serve the Lord and believe in his Son, Christ Jesus.'"

Thus by the Christian courage of a woman was the true religion of Jesus Christ established in Hawaii, and the worship of Pele forever stamped out on these beautiful islands. The story of Kiolani's sacrifice, of her miraculous preservation on Mount Kileaua and her return after being mourned as one dead, is held dear in the Christian homes of the Sandwich Isles, where mothers tell it to their children as they speak of the great sacrifice of "Christ that died; yea, rather that is risen again." (Romans 8: 34.)

SUBMISSION AND REST.

THE camel, at the close of day
Kneels down upon the sandy plain
To have his burden lifted off,
And rest again.

My soul, thou too should to thy knees
When daylight draweth to a close,
And let thy Master lift the load
And grant repose.

Else how couldst thou to-morrow meet
With all to-morrow's work to do,
If thou thy burden all the night
Dost carry through?

The camel kneels at break of day
To have his guide replace his load;
Then rises up anew to take
The desert road.

So thou shouldst kneel at morning's dawn
That God may give thee daily care;
Assured that he no load too great
Will make thee bear.

A JEW LIBELLED.

IN the Supreme Court of Onondaga County, New York, a suit has been brought by a Jew of Syracuse, N. Y., against a Jewish journal for libel. The plaintiff in his complaint alleges that in a recent issue, the journal in question spoke of him as a Christian and the accusation caused him to "lose the respect, confidence, love, esteem, and the patronage of his brother Hebrews;" that he was brought into "scandal, infamy, and disgrace with and among his neighbors to the extent of causing it to be suspected and believed by the said neighbors and citizens that the plaintiff had been guilty of the offence herein mentioned, to wit, of being a Christian," and he claims compensation to the amount of $2500. It is probable that the charge has really injured the man. It is a pity that it should be false. If it were true he would have no need to apply to the courts as he would have the consolation that Jesus gives to all who suffer for bearing his name, that they who have lost houses or lands for his sake shall receive a hundred-fold. (Matt. 19: 29.)

A REUNION IN AN ALMSHOUSE.

A vow has been broken involuntarily by a man and his wife in Massachusetts. They were married nearly sixty years ago and for some years lived happily together in one of the towns in the northern part of the State. But trouble came; there were frequent quarrels and at last in a moment of anger, they separated, each registering a solemn vow that they would never live under the same roof again. They went their ways and for fifty years they never saw each other. The husband degenerated into an idle, thriftless fellow and about two years ago, at the age of eighty-five, he was admitted into the county poor-house. The wife did well for a time, but a long sickness absorbed her savings, and she, too, being too old and infirm to support herself, fell into extreme poverty. She is seventy-eight years of age and not likely to live many months. It became necessary that she should be cared for at the public expense, and she has been taken to the same poor-house in which her husband is sheltered. Thus, in spite of their solemn vow, husband and wife are living again under the same roof. Doubtless they would have kept up their separation to the end if their poverty had not brought them together again. Many a man who in the days of prosperity separated from his God and became a backslider wandering in sin, has been similarly brought back by adversity. (Ps. 119: 67.)

A MISTAKE ABOUT A STATUE.

Two ladies stood gazing intently, one day last week, at the gilded figure of Diana, which has recently been placed on the top of the tall tower of Madison Square Garden, New York. One of the ladies was somewhat excited and, regardless of the attention she was attracting from passers-by, gave forcible expression to her vexation. "I never was more mistaken in my life," she was heard to say. "My father and brother said the statue faced the north, but I insisted that it faced the west. I was looking at it only yesterday, and I felt as sure as I did of my own existence that I saw its face turned to the west, and I said I would prove I was right and I would bring you as a witness. Now we shall have to admit they were right. - It certainly does face the north. I was wrong and I never felt more chagrined in my life." The ladies turned away to continue their walk, but at the corner of the street they gave another look at the big figure. It no longer faced the north, but was looking eastward. Then they perceived that it was a weather-vane, and its position varied with the wind. The statue was fulfilling the purpose for which it was set up and the ladies had no reasonable cause of complaint against it. So much, however, cannot be said for some professing Christians about whom a similar mistake is sometimes made. When on Sundays their faces are set heavenward, and on week days are set toward the world, eagerly pursuing its riches and pleasures, different opinions may be formed of them by people who see them on different days. The correct opinion is that given by the Apostle who adds the warning that double-minded men must not expect to "receive anything of the Lord." (James 1: 6, 7.)

ROPE-CLIMBING MADE EASY.

It is more difficult to climb a rope than people who have not attempted it suppose. Firemen, sailors and others in spite of long practice find the effort fatiguing and painful. An attempt to aid them has been made by an ingenious inventor who has recently patented his device. It consists of two boards joined by a hinge and held firm by strong clamps. The rope passes through the centre and on the upper side are leather loops into which the climber thrusts his feet. When the feet are raised and the weight of the body is supported by the hands, the rope passes easily between the boards, but when the feet are pressed downward the rope is gripped firmly and the climber can rest on a secure standing-place until he is ready to make a new lift with his hands. The device, therefore, reduces the labor of climbing and also prevents the danger of the man slipping down again. The latter advantage is important, for the climber is very apt to slip back unless he has a very firm grip of the rope. It is so in spiritual matters. Reaction too often follows a period of religious exaltation in a revival or other seasons of special privileges, and the height attained is lost in a time of depression. Mechanical devices are not available in such a case and there is no remedy for him who would rise but to keep a firm hold, through faith, on God and pray for strength to resist the attractions of the world, "forgetting the things which are behind and reaching forth unto those things which are before." (Phil. 3: 14.)

DELUDED LABORERS.

Five Italians were working hard for several days last week on a dock in New York getting freight on board a steamer about to sail for Palermo. They worked with a will and talked cheerfully with each other. Shortly before the time for the steamer to sail and when their work was done, they mysteriously disappeared. When the vessel had been about twelve hours out, the five men came up from the lower deck. They were reported to the captain as stowaways. They indignantly denied the charge. A voyage to Italy had been promised them, they said, as payment for their labor in loading the ship. The captain repudiated any promise of the kind. He had placed the work of lading in the hands of a contractor who was to employ and pay his own help. The contractor, it appears, had engaged the men and instead of paying them in money promised them a free voyage home. At the last, he set them at work on the lower deck, and ordered them to remain there for some hours. The vessel had been delayed by contrary winds so that she was still within easy reach of Long Island when the men were discovered. The captain, therefore, put them in a boat and sent them ashore, advising them to hunt up the contractor who had employed them and sue him for their pay. The men were grievously disappointed, but they will probably recover compensation. There is reason to fear that many persons are similarly deluded as to their hopes of reaching heaven. All will be disappointed who expect to get there as a reward for good works. (Gal. 2: 16.)

CRAZED BY A TOY.

DEALERS in conjurors' paraphernalia have been selling, for some time past, a toy resembling Planchette, the little instrument which a few years ago caused much discussion among the spiritualists. The new toy is named "Ouija" and it is supposed to answer questions submitted to it, the answers being given by a revolving pointer, centred on a dial, around which the letters of the alphabet are arranged. On Nov. 18 a lady in Bridgeport, Conn., purchased one of these toys and the next day she and a friend proceeded to experiment with it. The lady had a serious reason for obtaining information. She is engaged to be married to a railroad official who is frequently away from home on his business. She was in doubt about the sincerity of his love, so she asked Ouija if he was faithful to her and would marry her. A negative answer was spelled out by the toy. She turned pale when the answer was given, but retained her composure by a strong effort. The next night however, she was found wandering about the streets in a demented condition. She was placed under medical care, and tranquilizing medicines were administered. She became more calm, but utterly melancholy. The only connected sentence she utters is, "Ouija said so, and it is so." The doctors say she must have been under nervous strain for some time and it only remained for the mysterious toy to snap the delicate cord. As the lady did not live in a remote age when the Oracles were consulted, nor in a heathen land where questions are decided by the condition of the organs of slaughtered animals, but in a land of Bibles, it is a pity that she should have resorted to superstitious methods of ending her suspense. If she had consulted the Word she would have learned how true light comes to one "whose way is hedged in." (Job 3: 23.)

A PATIENT REJECTED.

A DISTURBANCE in a physician's residence on the East Side of New York a few days ago attracted a crowd, and a policeman was sent for. On making his way in he found the physician in a wildly excited state, acting like a madman. He hurried to a street box and sent out a call for an ambulance and then returned and controlled the excited man by force. In a few minutes the ambulance arrived, the physician was placed in it and driven to Bellevue Hospital. To the surprise of the attendant the receiving surgeon refused to admit the patient. No sooner did he see him than he recognized him as a patient who had already been under treatment there twice and had been discharged as cured only two days before. "He is a cocaine habitue," said the surgeon, "and he is suffering from an overdose. We can do nothing more for him; we have cured him twice." Being asked what should be done with the man, as it would be dangerous to take him home, where he might do injury to himself or his family, he replied: "Better take him to the police station." This was accordingly done, and the physician was detained as a prisoner. There was nothing else to be done, as the hospital surgeon knew he had no power which would reach the patient's will, and without that there was no hope of a permanent cure. The case shows the inferiority of human to divine power in the treatment of such sufferers. When the drunkard or the vicious man gives himself up to Christ for salvation he receives a new heart and is strong in the strength of God. (Ezek. 11: 19: 20.)

A CHRIST-LIKE MISSION.

A REPORTER assigned to a murder case in Mulberry Street, New York, the other day, made a discovery that surprised him. The houses there are dark and dingy. Poverty of the most squalid type abounds all around. Drunkenness and vice are everywhere. The house the reporter entered had nothing in its externals to distinguish it from its neighbors. The entrance was as mean and paintless, the hall as dark and dirty, and the passages narrowed off into apparent solidity in the gloomy recesses of the interior, as in the other houses. But he noticed within, a door freshly painted and the windows were clean and polished. Opening that door he was astonished to see marks of refinement and elegance. Exquisite pictures were on the walls, a bookcase filled with choice volumes, vases with beautiful flowers, signs of culture were all around. He was amazed and inquired what was the meaning of this oasis in the moral desert. He learned that a few months ago two young ladies hired the rooms and had lived there ever since. They were college graduates, holding diplomas as physicians. They attended the poor and prescribed for them, accepting such fees as they could afford to pay, and in many cases gratuitously. Living in the midst of the squalor and misery, they were exerting an influence for good throughout the neighborhood. "What can have impelled them to such a life? What can be their motive?" asks the reporter. The answer is not far to seek. The words of the Apostle explain the principle which animates them: "Because he laid down his life for us, we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren," (1 John 3: 13.)

SAVE THE CITIES.

THE destitution of most cities has been mapped out. Get a map of the neglected portions of your own city. Do you know anything about it? Do you walk through the streets in the morning going to business, and at night returning from business, without any idea of the wretchedness in your city? Who will enter on this work of city evangelization? Not those whose nostrils are easily offended with bad odors. Not those whose chief work it is to look after a refined taste. Not those who are more fearful of having their patent leathers soiled, than that thousands of souls will go on unbled. I hear coming up through all the streets of the city a cry of bereavement uncomfited, of drunkenness unpitied, of uncleanness that knows no way of reformation. Behold the gambling hells! Behold the grog-shops! Behold the houses of sin! O where are the Christian men and women in the strength of Christ to go out and invite the lost, the abandoned, back to the heart of an all-forgiving God? Where are the John Howards to carry light into the dungeons? Where are the Elizabeth Frys to take the message of heaven to the abandoned? Where are the Harlan Pages to preach Christ at the street corners? Oh, Lord Jesus, didst thou weep over the city and shall we stand stolidly looking at all this wreck of broken families, and broken fortunes, and broken hearts? Weep out, O Church of God! Weep for the children of the street, born in the straw, nurtured in infamy, and schooled in shame. Weep for the victims of evil habits, over whom the Juggernaut hath gone, grinding into crimson mortar their blood and bones! Weep for the filth, and the squalor, and the living sepulchres of metropolitan crime. What is it I hear? Hark! it is the shriek of the dying populations of our cities. They want bread, they want medicine, they want clothes, they want the Bible, they want Christ, they want Heaven. They have no comfort for this life; they have no hope for the life to come. Wake up! Why stand ye here all the day idle? If you can't save a multitude of them, can't you save one?

There must be a field somewhere. Sea captains are generally sympathetic, and when they are going over the water, and see a signal of distress hoisted, they bear down upon the ship and take her passengers from the wreck. But there have been cases when these men have been hard-hearted, and seen a signal of distress, but paid no attention to it, and came into port. How they have been execrated by the sailors and the people of the country. What do you think will be said of us in eternity if it shall be found out that we voyaged on through life only careful about our own comfort while all around us there were signals of distress lifted, but we cared not for the suffering. Ah, is there no work for you to do? Join some of the regiments; belong to the artillery, or the cavalry, or the infantry of the Church.

THE WELSH.

IN all departments of American life we feel more and more the influence of Welsh immigration. It is good blood, and it is corrective of many kinds of blood not so good. Those of us who have seen the Welsh in their native country know that they are the most genial and hearty of all people. When they laugh they laugh, when they cry they cry, and when they cheer they cheer, and there is no half-way work about it. Their language is said to be only second in sweetness and rhythm, but the English tongue seems to be crowding it out. The melody of the Welsh vernacular we must, however, take on faith. We give our readers an opportunity of practising the music of the names of some of the Welsh valleys, such as Llangollen, Maentwrog, and Ystwyth; of some of the Welsh medicinal springs, such as Llanwrtyd, Trefriw, and Llandrindod; of some of the Welsh mountains, such as Penwmcerwyn and Aanfawddwy. If you are at all puzzled with the pronunciation of these names, you will please get one of the Welsh dictionaries, entitled: "Dymchwelaid allor uchely Pab." And if then you cannot succeed you will perhaps stop, and be as ignorant as I am of the language which the Welsh say has in it capacities for tenderness, and nice shades of meaning, and pathos, and thunderings of power beside which our English is insipid.

Within comparatively a few years the English government has found Wales to be her most valuable treasure-house. She has the largest coal fields in Europe, and in vertical thickness the strata surpass the world. Her iron, and lead, and copper, and zinc, and silver, and gold, must yet command the attention of all nations. Her minerals, unlike those of most countries, are within fifteen or twenty miles of the sea, and hence easily transported.

Considering the fact that the language is spoken by less than a million of people, the literature of the Welsh is incomparable for extent. The first book was published in 1531, and consisted of twenty-one leaves. Four years after, another book. Eleven years after, another book which they strangely called "The Bible," containing the Alphabet, an Almanac, the Ten Commandments, the Lord's Prayer, the Apostles' Creed, and something about their national games. An astounding "Bible" that was. Eighteen years after this another book appeared. The slow advancement was because the prominent men of the English nation wanted the Welsh language to die out, on the supposition that these people would be more loyal to the throne if they all spoke the English language. But afterwards, the printing-press of Wales got into full swing, and now books and periodicals by thousands of copies are printed and circulated in the Welsh language. But, excepting a few ballads of an immoral nature, corrupt literature dies as soon as it touches this region. Many bad English novels that blight other countries cannot live a month in the pure atmosphere of these mountains. The fact is, that the Welsh are an intensely religious people, and one of their foremost men declares that in all their literature there is not one book atheistic or infidel.

The grandest pulpit eloquence of the centuries has sounded through these gorges. I asked an intelligent Welsh lady if there were any people living who remembered the great Welsh divine, Christmas Evans. She replied, "Yes! I remember him—that is, I remember the excitement. I was a child in church, and sat in a pew, and could not see him for the crowd, but the scene made on me an indelible impression." For consecrated fire, the Welsh preachers are the most effective in the world.

Taken all in all, there are no people in Europe that more favorably impressed me than the Welsh. The namby-pamby traveller, afraid of getting his shoes tarnished, and who loves to shake hands with the tips of the fingers, and desires conversation in a whisper, would be disgusted with Wales. But they who have nothing of the fastidious in their temperaments, and who admire strength of voice, strength of arm, strength of purpose, and strength of character, will find among the Welsh illimitable entertainment.

BRIEF NOTES.

An invitation has been sent to Rev. Francis E. Smiley to hold union Evangelistic services in Asbury Park, N. J. The call is signed by the pastors of all the Churches and the Executive officers of the Y. M. C. A.

During Pastor C. H. Spurgeon's recent illness, no less than 7,000 messages of condolence and sympathy were sent to him. He is convinced that his restoration from the verge of the grave was granted in answer to the many prayers offered in his behalf by Christians in all lands.

The American Sunday-School Union has done excellent work in the North-west. During the past three years it has established 5,261 Sunday Schools in needy or destitute communities and has organized from those schools 335 churches. There are now 22,887 teachers in the schools and 186,017 children.

The prophecy that swords will be beaten into ploughshares is a long way from fulfillment, but Gen. Booth has made a beginning in that direction. He has received from the British Government a gift of 30,000 soldiers' helmets which were battered and spoiled in India and Egypt, and has set his salvage corps to picking them to pieces for re-making into articles for domestic use.

Rev. S. Anderson, D. D., who has been laboring in the McAll Mission stations in France is now reporting on that work to the American McAll auxiliaries. On Nov. 17 he addressed a meeting in New York at which he spoke in enthusiastic terms of the success of the French work. The American auxiliaries sent the sum of $40,000 last year to Mr. McAll for the support of his work. Dr. Anderson urged a continuance of the subscriptions which are much needed.

Jerry McAuley Mission in Water Street, New York, celebrated its nineteenth anniversary on Nov. 22. Mr. R. Fulton Cutting presided at the afternoon meeting. The mission, which was established by the late Jerry McAuley is doing a wonderful work for God, under the conduct of Mr. S. H. Hadley. Many testimonies were given at the meetings by men whose lives have been transformed by the blessing of God on the services held there.

The Chinese Sunday School Association, at its recent meeting in Greenwood Baptist Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., discussed the scheme of organizing Chinese missions in the centre of the Chinese quarter in Brooklyn, New York and other cities. It was proposed to give secular as well as religious instruction in these missions. The plan was finally held over for further consideration and to ascertain how many workers would be willing to give their services and what financial aid could be secured.

A meeting will be held on Dec. 17, in the Managers' Room, Bible House, New York, of the International Peace Committee appointed last year by the General Assembly of the Southern Presbyterian Church. This committee was intrusted with the duty of communicating with the representatives of other Christian denominations throughout the world, inviting them to unite in a general petition to the Governments of all nations to organize an international tribunal for the settlement by arbitration of international disputes. The committee will hold a general conference in Cooper Institute after its meeting when delegates from the churches are invited to attend. The delegates are requested to send a notification of their appointment before the meeting to the Chairman of the Committee, Rev. W. A. Campbell, D. D., Richmond, Va.

THE WIFE'S CHAPTER.

PROVERBS XXXI.

THIS week we get a chapter for the Brides—that have been, are, and those who expect to be.

No girl should ever get married till this chapter out of the book of wisdom is fully written on her heart.

It's written by a woman; no one else could have well given it. Oh! I well know it comes from King Lemuel, but he was only an amanuensis. The first verse don't close till it tells how his mother taught him these things. It takes a woman to pen such words.

No position in this old world bigger than motherhood, and to get that, there must first be wifehood, which precedes the other as naturally and necessarily as root, trunk and branch precede blossom and fruit.

Architects, carpenters and builders can make houses, but it takes a wife to make a home; and it takes a heap of heaven to make a good wife.

A man, a real man, I mean a genuine man, won't marry a butterfly! He wants a heart comforter, a head soother and a home maker.

The next young men's mass meeting I hold, I'm going to advise the marriageable portion to get a photograph of this chapter, then look up its counterpart, and see a clergyman quick.

How to Mark Your Bible.

"Have one to mark, one of your own, one with good print, marginal references, well bound in silk, printed on rice paper that will stand ink. One with a text book bound in the back is the best.

"Might as well use other people's hats or shoes as to use other people's Bibles. I'd sell my clothes any day to buy a good one, if I had none.

"Mark the first page with your name and your life text, and then add your year text, as the years come and go.

"Make memoranda of your conversion, and the dates of great spiritual blessings. If some earnest prayer gets a mighty answer, make a note of it, with a reference to the promise which brought the blessing.

"Make the promises stand out by underlining them with ink. When you find a promise for gold, mark that. There are hundreds of Bible verses that centre around Hag-gai 2:8. I always go to them when in need of money, then work, and it always comes.

"Mark the books and chapters; for instance, at the beginning of Exodus write 'Book of Redemption;' over Jeremiah write 'The Backsliders' Book;' over James write 'Work;' over the eleventh chapter of Hebrews write 'Faith Chapter;' and Proverbs 31; 'Wife's Chapter,' and so on, till each chapter and book is well marked.

"Take the promises for Grace and mark them. Why, II. Corinthians, 9:8, is as powerful as an army. One promise like that is better to trust in than forty centurion bands.

"You want the passages marked that will help you in dealing with inquiries of every kind. Then, too, you want the texts that will help you to help weak and discouraged Christians.

"When souls come into the light, put their names in your book, then when you see them, pray for them.

"Now and then a stanza of some hymn will be so blessed to you that you will want to copy it on the blank pages.

"Have some blank pages put in with rubber; when full you can take it out. Also have a place where you can make a note of good illustrations. Lastly, have your own plan; but have one. If you don't make a note of the good things, they will go from you. Put your own name alongside of the best promises; mine is written many times all through my Bible; this makes them more personal to me, and thus the Bible becomes a very precious book. I'd not take a thousand dollars cash for my own Bible. It's priceless."

Don't overdo it. Some Bibles are so marked up, that God's word is second, and human thought, notes and words, first. This is not right.

It's a great thing to preach a big sermon, full of Christ and salvation, but I believe in heaven it will count as much for the one who goes out and gets some lost sinner to come and hear it.

RECORD OF THE WEEK.

End of the Brazilian Rebellion—A Double Water Famine—The Next National Convention—Europe's Spectre of Famine—Launching a Cruiser—A Noble Author Dead.

LIKE his predecessor, Dom Pedro, President Deodoro da Fonseca has yielded to the determined opposition of the Brazilian people and resigned his office. The revolt in Rio Grande do Sul threatened to extend to other provinces, but the Dictator's army and navy were believed to be equal to its suppression and he had made preparations to that end when a spark of revolt broke out in the Capital which was quickly fanned into a conflagration. The people of Rio Janeiro rose in arms against the Dictator's government. An armed force, on Nov. 23, attacked the naval arsenal. Fighting had begun and there was general expectation of a desperate battle when Fonseca, foreseeing defeat inevitable, put an end to the revolution by resigning, together with the members of his Cabinet. When this became known, the people went wild with joy. In retiring, Fonseca announced Floriano Peixotto, Vice-President of the Provisional Government, as his temporary successor. The state of siege was at once declared at an end. For a time, owing to the excitement, business in the capital was suspended but no disorder followed. It is expected that acting-President Peixotto will convoke Congress promptly and that all military operations directed against the people of Rio Grande do Sul will be suspended. The vice-President has not figured prominently in recent political affairs, and is therefore the more acceptable to the people, although it is by no means certain that his authority will be confirmed. At the moment of Fonseca's resignation, the revolt in the provinces had assumed very formidable proportions. The States of Bahia and Pernambuco had armed with the purpose of joining the revolt, and there was disaffection in the northern provinces. Many families were leaving the country. The Rio Grande do Sul Junta, through Gen. Barreto, the revolutionary governor, had informed Fonseca, in response to his overtures, that it would only accept terms when he resigned the Dictatorship, obeyed the Constitution and reorganized the public service. Fonseca was recruiting his army by enlisting immigrants—principally Germans and Italians. The Junta had 50,000 troops and six warships, besides a plentiful armament of cannon and torpedoes. The popular impression that Fonseca's real object was to establish a personal rule was the means of strengthening the Junta greatly.

The Pride of Our Navy.

PATRIOTIC Americans must feel a thrill of national pride in contemplating the splendid warship that was launched at Philadelphia on December 1. The latest addition to our navy has been christened the New York. She is an armored cruiser with great offensive and defensive qualities, and is acknowledged to be the superior of any naval vessel we have thus far constructed, except possibly the harbor defence monitors. Experienced officers declare her ability to cope successfully with any naval vessel afloat. She is larger than any other vessel of the White Squadron, very swift, and Secretary Tracy declares emphatically that "there is not her equal afloat in any of the great navies of the world." The New York has four decks, carries a powerful armament of eight-inch and four-inch guns, six-pounders, one-pounders and Gatlings. Her length is 380 feet, and her highest speed 20 knots an hour.

The Next National Convention.

AFTER a hot rivalry between several cities in view of the approaching Republican National Convention, Minneapolis has secured the prize. San Francisco had offered free transportation to delegates. New York put forward her claims in vain. Chicago seemed indifferent whether the Convention met within her borders or not. Omaha, Pittsburg, Cincinnati, Detroit, and a few other cities were also candidates for the honor. Boomers for the different cities gathered in force at Washington and the contest was a very lively one. The final ballot by the Republican National Committee (after seven had been taken fruitlessly) gave Minneapolis twenty-nine votes, Cincinnati fifteen and New York three. The "Twin City" people were delighted beyond measure at the result.

More Christians Massacred in China.

Intelligence comes from China of another frightful massacre of Christians in that country. From the meagre reports thus far received, it seems that armed bands have for some time past have been marauding and pillaging in the North. They burned the Belgian Mission stations at Taylor and Sanchi, and killed over one hundred converts to Christianity. The local governors ascribed the raid to Mongolian robbers, and troops were sent to the scene. It is impossible, at present, to tell the number of European victims. There is a very strong suspicion that the government is insincere in its pretence of searching out the perpetrators of the massacre, and that the real criminals will be permitted to escape.

A Religious Revolt in Persia.

INTELLIGENCE from Teheran, the Persian capital, states that the mujtahid or high priest of the Shiah sect—the leading religious denomination in that country with a following estimated at 7,000,000—recently inspired a rebellion in the northern province of Mazandaran. A battle took place between the rebels and the royal troops, resulting in the defeat of the former, with two hundred killed. Many prisoners were taken and it is expected that they will be summarily dealt with. The high priest was among those captured. The Shiahs or Shiites are found in several countries, those in Persia being known as the Haidar sect, who believe in metempsychosis and the descent of Deity upon his creatures. He sometimes appearing in the person of an imam, etc. They all believe in Mohammed. The cause of their rebellion is not stated in the despatches.

Will Europe face a Famine in 1892?

In last week's CHRISTIAN HERALD, reference was made to the very interesting estimate by a wellknown statistician regarding the crops of the world. To-day we give a portrait of the statistician in question—Mr. C. Wood Davis of Kansas. Mr. Davis' calculations, it will be remembered, showed that in nearly all the European states there would be serious crop deficiencies, while in our own country, the surplus would be in the neighborhood of 250,000,000 bushels of wheat available for export. But the entire crop-raising portion of the globe will still show a deficiency of 78,000,000 bushels of wheat and over 300,000,000 of rye. These estimates, taken in conjunction with the latest advices from Europe, indicate that several transatlantic nations will probably be brought face to face with famine next year. Count Lyof Tolstoi, the Russian social reformer, has published a demand that the government at St. Petersburg declare without delay whether the stock of grain is sufficient to last through the next summer, and advocates the purchase of corn in the United States in time to avert the famine and the terrible social disturbances that are sure to attend it. He declares that, from his own calculations, the stock will be insufficient, and urges the government to guarantee to feed the people until the next harvest. His two daughters have set a noble example by opening a free refectory for the famine-stricken on his estate. On the other hand, the Russian Official Messenger states that the stock on hand is abundant for the time being, but in view of the coincidence of opinion among European statisticians and of the calculations of Mr. Davis this assurance would seem to be a questionable one. Meanwhile the Czar has forbidden the exportation of Russian wheat.

The Farmers' Alliance.

ONE of the events of the near future which is attracting considerable attention from politicians all over the country just now, is the National Convention of the Farmers' Alliance, which is to meet in Indianapolis. The President of the Alliance is J. L. Polk, an editor of Raleigh, N. C., who lately aspired to succeed Mr. Vance in the United States Senate, and who is said to have claimed for the Alliance the credit for the political upheaval of last year. Whatever position the Alliance may take in the Presidential campaign is yet a matter of speculation. It is announced that its Congressional candidates will be pledged to the support of the Sub-Treasury Bill and other Alliance ideas. The coming Convention will, in all probability, decide the future course of the Alliance, whether it shall organize as a Third Party or keep on its old lines and leave members free to act with either of the old parties where they do not antagonize Alliance principles. There are several factions in the organization at present, but the leaders believe all discords will be successfully harmonized when the convention meets. A portrait of President Polk is given above.

A Poet-Governor Dead.

Alvin P. Hovey, Governor of Indiana, who died last week, was a remarkable instance of the possibilities that are open to poor boys in this country. He was born in Mount Vernon, Ind., and received but little education, being apprenticed to a brickmaker when he was thirteen years old. Alvin studied in his leisure time, and a few years later was a teacher in the village school. While teaching he read law, and at 21 was admitted to the bar. In 1850 he was chosen as Supreme Court Judge of his Judicial District. He served all through the war with distinction, and came out of it a Brigadier-General. At its close he entered the diplomatic service and, on returning home, went to Congress where he was always an active and energetic member, especially where measures affecting the welfare of ex-soldiers were concerned. He was a writer and poet of no mean order, and much of his verse has attained a wide circulation. Among his friends he was known as the "Poet-Governor."

A Double Water Famine.

By a singular coincidence, the cities of New York and Brooklyn were both threatened with a water famine last week. Continued drought had so reduced the supply in the great Croton reservoirs, which feed the metropolis, that the householders were warned not to waste the precious water, and the whole city of a million and a half souls was put upon short allowance until copious rain fell and the reservoirs were replenished. The neighboring city of Brooklyn, which is liberally supplied from several large reservoirs, found itself suddenly in an even worse condition than New York, through an accident to its main service reservoir, where an embankment gave way, breaking the water conduit and burying a number of laborers under thousands of tons of debris. Four men were taken out dead and several others were badly injured. Immediately after the cave-in, the water supply of the larger part of Brooklyn was shut off. Besides the inconvenience in households, many business establishments, factories, etc., were compelled to be idle through lack of steam, and thousands of workmen were thus direct losers by the accident. The broken main, which was quickly repaired, has a capacity of between 80,000,000 and 100,000,000 gallons per day.

A Noble Author Dead.

In the death of the Right-Hon. Edward Robert Bulwer-Lytton, England's Ambassador to France, the literary world loses one of the most brilliant writers of the present day. Earl Lytton was better known by his nom de plume of "Owen Meredith" than by his title, although he has for many years borne a prominent part in English diplomacy. He was born in 1831, and was the son of Baron Lytton, the famous novelist, but at the time of his birth his parent was then only plain Mr. Bulwer-Lytton. After receiving an education at Harrow and under private tutors, he entered the diplomatic service and came to this country as the private secretary of his uncle, who was then British Minister at Washington. In 1852, he was transferred to the Legation at Florence, and afterward successively served at Vienna, Copenhagen, Athens, and Lisbon. On his father's death in 1872, he became Baron Lytton, then Earl Lytton and Viscount Knebworth. During Disraeli's Premiership, he was appointed Viceroy of India and afterwards accepted the French mission. When he resigned the Viceroyalty in 1880, Lord Beaconsfield handed to Queen the resignation together with his own, and thus the two most remarkable men in the British Empire simultaneously went out of public office. The previous year, an attempt had been made in India to assassinate him by a man named Deesa, who was afterward found to be insane. For many years he had been a sufferer from cancer. He first made his debut in the literary world as the author of a volume of poems in 1855 and this was rapidly followed by other works of the same character. It is worth remarking that his first book was written while he was in Washington, attached to the legation. His Chronicles and Characters, issued in 1868, Fables in Song, Ring of Amasis, The Wanderers, Servian Songs and other books have attained world-wide circulation and demonstrated that he inherited a remarkable share of the genius of his gifted father. His latest task was writing his father's biography and editing all the latter's numerous political works.

The natives of Madagascar are again resenting the French Protectorate and a rupture is considered not improbable.

The English Tories, it is said, contemplate the introduction of a new Irish Government Bill in Parliament at an early date.

Bismarck is becoming very anxious and careworn, and the feeble condition of his wife is producing a marked effect on his own once robust frame.

The Royal nuptials of Archduchess Louise of Austria-Tuscany and Prince Frederick Augustus of Saxony, were celebrated at Vienna with great splendor last week.

After many months of drought, Texas enjoyed a much-needed rain last week. Thousands of tons of hay and many miles of fences were consumed by the drought.

Eight persons were bitten by a large Newfoundland dog in Newark, N. J., a few days ago. The animal which is supposed to have been mad, was finally killed.

Francis McGory, an iron-moulder, jumped from the Brooklyn Bridge into the East River on Sunday, November 22d, and was instantly killed. He is reported to have sacrificed his life on a drunken wager.

The Rev. Thomas Hill, D.D. LL.D., ex-President of Harvard College died in Boston, last week, in his 74th year. He was a noted writer, an authority on various educational topics and a scientist of wide acquirements.

The Spanish Cabinet has resigned, and Senor Canovas del Castillo new Ministry. The resignation was caused by the fact that the politicians of the country seemed to favor the programme of the Conservative party, rather than that of the Cabinet.

Count Schouvaloff, of Russia, who is now visiting Berlin, has met with a rebuff at the hands of the German bankers through whom he endeavored to reopen the German market to the Russian loans. There is little prospect of any of the loans being placed in Emperor William's territory.

Not the Berlin Bourse alone but the European Exchanges generally appear to have been affected by the recent heavy banking failures in the German capital. One of the heaviest losses by the insolvency of Hirschfeld & Wolff was Prince Henry of Prussia who had 300,000 marks deposited with the speculative concern.

Letters from Valparaiso indicate a subsidence of the Chilean war furore, and a change in public sentiment regarding the Baltimore affair. The preliminary examination of witnesses concerned in the attack on our sailors is ended, and the result is awaited with deep interest. It is said the inquiry exculpates the Chilean police.

Ex-King Milan of Serbia, who is now living most extravagantly in Paris, a few weeks ago received from the Regents of Serbia four million francs, on condition that he would not cross the Servian frontier again and would abandon all his public and private claims on the country. His creditors immediately attached the bulk of the money.

HOW TO BE SAVED.

"God our Saviour; who will have all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth."—1 Timothy 2:3, 4.

I DO not intend to treat my text controversially. It is like the stone which makes the corner of a building, and it looks toward a different side of the gospel from that which is mostly before us. Two sides of the building of truth meet here. It would be very easy indeed to set ourselves in battle array, and during the next half-hour to carry on a very fierce attack against those who differ from us in opinion upon points which could be raised from this text. I do not see that any good would come of it, and, as we have very little time to spare, and life is short, we had better spend it upon something that may better tend to our edification.

God's Wish.

It is quite certain that when we read that God will have all men to be saved it does not mean that he wills it with the force of a decree or a divine purpose, for, if he did, then all men would be saved. He willed to make the world, and the world was made: he does not so will the salvation of all men, for we know that all men will not be saved. There will at the last be goats at the left hand as well as sheep on the right, tares to be burned as well as wheat to be garnered, chaff to be blown away as well as corn to be preserved.

Does not the text mean that it is the wish of God that men should be saved? The word "wish" gives as much force to the original as it really requires, and the passage should run thus—"whose wish it is that all men should be saved; and come to a knowledge of the truth." "But if he wishes it to be so, why does he not make it so?" Your question is only one form of

of the ages,—"If God be infinitely good and powerful, why does not his power carry out to the full all his beneficence?" He has an infinite benevolence which, nevertheless, is not in all points worked out by his infinite omnipotence; and if anybody asked me why it is not, I cannot tell. I have never set up to be an explainer of all difficulties, and I have no desire to do so.

I thank God for a thousand things I cannot understand. When I cannot get to know the reason why, I say to myself, "Why should I know the reason why? I had rather trust my God. I am a poor silly child at my very best: my Father must know better than I. There stands the text, and I believe that it is my Father's wish that 'all men should be saved, and come to the knowledge of the truth.' But I know, also, that he does not will it, so that he will save any one of them, unless they believe in his dear Son; for he has told us over and over that he will not. He will not save any man except he forsakes his sins, and turns to him with full purpose of heart: that I also know. And so we will say no more about the matter, but just go on to the more practical part of the text.

Here is our proposition: It is by a knowledge of

that men are saved. Observe that stress is laid upon the article: it is the truth, and not every truth. Though it is a good thing to know the truth about anything, and we ought not to be satisfied to take up with a falsehood upon any point, yet it is not every truth that will save us. We are not saved by knowing any one theological truth we may choose to think of, for there are some theological truths which are comparatively of inferior value. They are not vital or essential, and a man may know them, and yet may not be saved. It is

The Truth Which Saves.

Jesus Christ is the truth: the whole testimony of God about Christ is the truth.

This knowledge of the grand facts which are here called the truth saves men, and we will notice its mode of operation. Very often it begins its work in a man by arousing him, and thus it saves him from carelessness. He did not know anything about the truth which God has revealed, and so he lived like a brute beast. If he had enough to eat and to drink he was satisfied. If he laid by a little money he was delighted. So long as the days passed pretty merrily, and he was free from aches and pains, he was satisfied. He heard about religion, but he thought it did not concern him. He supposed that there were some people who might be the better for thinking about it, but as far as he was concerned, he thought no more about God or godliness than the ox of the stall or the ostrich of the desert.

Well, the truth came to him, and he received a knowledge of it. He knew only a part, and that a very dark and gloomy part of it, but it stirred him out of his carelessness, for he suddenly discovered that he was of God. Perhaps he heard a sermon, or read a tract, or had a practical word addressed to him by some Christian friend, and he found out enough to know that "he that believeth not is condemned already, because he hath not believed on the Son of God." That startled him. "God is angry with the wicked every day;"—that amazed him. He had not thought of it, perhaps he had not known it, but when he did know it, he could rest no longer. Then he came to a knowledge of this further truth, that after death there would be a judgment, that he would rise again, and that, being risen, he would have to stand before the judgment-seat of God to give an account of the things which he had done in the body. This came home very strikingly to him. I have known men, when first they have come to a knowledge of this truth, become unable to sleep. They were shaken out of their deadly lethargy by a knowledge of the truth.

The truth is useful to a man in another way: it saves him from prejudice. Often when men are awakened to know something about the wrath of God they begin to plunge about, to discover divers methods by which from that wrath of God. Consulting, first of all, with themselves, they think that, if they can reform—give up their grosser sins, and if they can join with religious people, they will make it all right. And there are some who go and listen to a kind of religious teacher; who says, "You must do good works. You must earn a good character. You must add to all this the ceremonies of our church." Under such untruthful notions we have known people who were somewhat aroused sit down again in a false peace. They have done all that they judged right and attended to all that they were told. Suddenly, by God's grace, they came to a knowledge of another truth, and that is by the deeds of the law there shall no flesh be justified in the sight of God. They discover that salvation is not by works of the law or by ceremonies, and that if any man be under the law he is also under the curse. When they also find out that there is necessary a righteousness better than their own—a perfect righteousness to justify them before God, and when they discover that they must be made new creatures in Christ Jesus, or else they must utterly perish, then they are saved from saved from the error of crying, "Peace, peace," when there is no peace. It is a grand thing when a knowledge of the truth stops us from trusting in a lie.

Moreover, it often happens that a knowledge of the truth stands a man in good stead for another purpose; it saves him from despair. Unable to be careless, and unable to find comfort in false confidences, some poor agitated minds are driven into a wide and stormy sea without rudder or compass, with nothing but wreck before them. "There is no hope for me," says the man. "I perceive I cannot save myself. I see that I am lost. I am dead in trespasses and sins, and cannot stir hand or foot. Surely now I may as well go on in sin, and even multiply my transgressions. The gate of mercy is shut against me; what is the use of fear where there is no room for hope?" At such a time, if the Lord leads the man to a knowledge of the truth, he perceives that though his sins be as scarlet they shall be as wool, and though they be red like crimson they shall be as white as snow. Now, when the soul comes to know that sin is put away by the atoning blood; when the heart discovers that it is us, but the life of God that comes to dwell in us; that we are not to be regenerated by our own actions, but are regenerated by the Holy Ghost who comes to us through the precious death of Jesus, then despair flies away, and the soul cries exultingly, "There is hope. There is hope. Christ died for sinners: why should I not have a part in that precious death?"

A saving knowledge of the truth, to take another line of things, works in this way. A knowledge of the truth shows a man his personal need of being saved. O you that are not saved, and who dream you do not need to be, you only require to know the truth, and you will perceive that you must be saved or lost for ever.

When a man comes in very deed to a knowledge of the truth about faith in Christ, he trusts Christ, and he is then and there saved from the guilt of sin; and he begins to be saved altogether from sin. God cuts the root of the power of sin that very day; but yet it has such life within itself that at the scent of water it will bud again. Sin in our members struggles to life. It has as many lives as a cat; there is no killing it. Now, when we come to a knowledge of the truth, we begin to learn in us—how the same Christ by whom we are justified, sanctifies, and works in us according to his working who worketh in us mightily, that we may be conformed to the image of Christ, and made meet to dwell with perfect saints above. Beloved, many of you that are saved from the guilt of sin, have a very hard struggle with the power of sin, and have much more conflict, perhaps, than you need to have, because you have not come to a knowledge of all the truth about indwelling sin. You will never overcome sin except by the blood of the Lamb. There is no sanctification except by faith.

How Sin is to be Killed

Now, I think I hear somebody say, "I think I know all about this." Yes, you may think you know it, and may not know anything at all about it. "O, but," says one, "I do know it. I learned the 'Assembly's Catechism' when I was a child. I have read the Bible ever since, and I am well acquainted with all the commonplaces of orthodoxy." That may be, dear friend, and yet you may not know the truth. I have heard of a man who knew how to swim, but, as he had never been in the water, I do not think much of his knowledge of swimming; in fact, he did not really know the art. So there are many persons who think they know and yet do not know because they have never had any personal acquaintance with the thing. A mere notional knowledge or a dry doctrinal knowledge is of no avail. We must know the truth in a very different way from that.

How are we to know it, then? Well, we are to know it, first, by

A Believing Knowledge.

You do not absolutely know a thing unless you believe it to be really so. If you doubt it, you do not know it. If you say, "I really am not sure it is true," then you cannot say that you know it. That which the Lord has revealed in holy Scripture you must devoutly believe to be true. In addition to this, your knowledge, if it becomes believing knowledge, must be personal knowledge—a persuasion that it is true in reference to yourself. It is true about your neighbor, about your brother, but you must believe it about yourself, or your knowledge is vain. There must be a personal appropriation of what you believe to be true. That is the kind of knowledge which saves the soul.

But this must be a powerful knowledge, by which I mean that it must operate in and upon your mind. A man is told that his house is on fire. I will suppose that standing here I held up a telegram, and said, "My friend, is your name so-and-so?" "Yes." "Well, your house is on fire." He knows the fact, does he not? Yes, but he sits quite still. Now, my impression is about that good brother, that he does not know, for he does not believe it. He cannot believe it surely: he may believe that but not his own. If it is really his house which is burning, and he knows it, what does he do? Why he gets up and goes off to see what he can do towards saving his goods. That is the kind of knowledge which saves the soul—when a man knows the truth about himself, and therefore his whole nature is moved and affected by the knowledge.

This knowledge when it comes really to save the soul is what we call experimental knowledge—knowledge acquired according to the exhortation of the psalmist, "Oh, taste and see that the Lord is good"—acquired by tasting. Now, at this present moment, I, speaking for myself, know that I am originally lost by nature. Do I believe it? Believe it? I am as sure of it as I am of my own existence. I know that I am lost by nature. It would not be possible for anybody to make me doubt that: I have felt it. How many weary days I spent under the pressure of that knowledge! Do I know that I could not save myself? Know it? Why, my poor, struggling heart labored this way and that, even as in the very fire with bitter disappointment, for I labored to climb and I continued trying and trying and trying with all my might, but never rose an inch higher. I tried to fill a bottomless tub with leaking buckets, and worked on and toiled and slaved, but never accomplished even the beginning of my unhappy task. I know, for I have tried it, that salvation is not in man, or in all the feelings, and weepings, and prayings, and Bible readings, and church goings which zeal could crowd together. Nothing whatsoever that man does can avail him towards his own salvation. This I know by sad trial of it, and failure in it.

To the Stars on a Treadwheel,

But I do know that there is real salvation by believing in Christ. Know it? I have never preached to you concerning that subject what I do not know by experience. In a moment, when I believed in Christ I leaped from despair to fullness of delight. Since I have believed in Jesus I have found myself totally new—changed altogether from what I was; and I find now that, in proportion as I trust in Jesus, I love God and try to serve him; but if at any time I begin to trust in myself, I forget my God, and I become selfish and sinful. Just as I keep on being nothing and taking Christ to be everything, so am I led in the paths of righteousness. I am merely talking of myself, because a man cannot bear witness about other people so thoroughly as he can about himself.

I am now going to draw an inference which is to be practical. It is this: in regard to you that are #### Seeking Salvation.

Does not the text show you that it is very possible that the reason why you have not found salvation is because you do not know the truth? Hence, I do most earnestly entreat the many of you young people who cannot get rest to be very diligent searchers of your Bibles. The first thing and the main thing is to believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, but if you say, "I do not understand it," or "I cannot believe," or if there be any such doubt rising in your mind, then it may be because you have not gained complete knowledge of the truth. It is very possible that somebody will say to you, "Believe, believe, believe." I would say the same to you, but I should like you to act upon the common-sense principle of knowing what is to be believed and in whom you are to believe. I explained this to one who came to me a few evenings ago. She said that she

Could Not Believe.

"Well," I said to her, "now suppose as you sit in that chair I say to you, 'Young friend, I cannot believe in you: you would say to me, 'I think you should.' Suppose I then replied, 'I wish I could.' What would you bid me do? Should I sit still and look at you till I said, 'I think I can believe in you?' That would be ridiculous. No, I should go and inquire, 'Who is this young person? What kind of character does she bear? What are her connections?' and when I knew all about you, then I have no doubt that I should say, 'I have made examination into this young woman's character, and I cannot help believing in her.'" Now, it is just so with Jesus Christ. If you say, "I cannot believe in him," read those four blessed testimonies of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John. Do you know that many, while they have been sitting, as it were at the foot of the cross, have cried out, "I cannot help believing. I cannot help believing. When I see my sin, it seems too great; but when I see my Saviour my iniquity vanishes away."

Definite Search.

I want you to be like the woman who lost her piece of silver. She did not light a candle and then say, "Bravo, I have lit a candle, this is enough." She did not take the broom and then sit down content, crying, "What a splendid broom!" When she raised a dust she did not exclaim, "What a dust I am making! I am surely making progress now." Some poor sinners, when they have been seeking, get into a dust of soul-trouble, and think it to be a comfortable sign. No, I'll warrant you, the woman wanted her groat; she did not mind the broom, or the dust, or the candle; she looked for the silver. So it must be with you. Never content yourself with the reading, the hearing, or the feeling. It is Christ you want. It is the precious piece of money that you must find; and you must sweep until you find it. Why, there it is! There is Jesus! Take him! Take him! Believe him now, even now, and you are saved.

Sin no More.

"Neither do I condemn thee; go, and sin no more."—JNO. 8: 11.

M. A. B., arr. by EL NATHAN.

JAMES McGRANAHAN.

1. Sin no more, thy soul is free, Christ has died to ran-som thee;
2. Sin no more, but close-ly keep Near the hand that guards the sheep;
3. Sin no more, His blood hath bought, Think on what His love hath wrought;
4. Sin no more, O sin no more, Je - sus lives to keep thee pure;

Now the power of sin is o'er, Je - sus bids thee sin no more.
Shun the snares that lured be - fore, Trem-bling go, and sin no more.
Think of what for thee He bore, Weep-ing go, and sin no more.
If o'er - ta - ken He'll re-store, Say - ing "Go, and sin no more."

CHORUS.

Sin no more, . . . thy soul is free, Christ has sin no more, thy soul is free, died . . . to ran - som thee; . . . Sing the Christ has died to ran - som thee;

mes-sage o'er and o'er, Christ for-gives thee, sin no more.

THE GOSPEL INVITATION.

If you have never been home before,
I bid you come to-day;
Thy Father is waiting to welcome his chud,
O sinner no longer delay.
Come home to-day, come home to-day,
Weary child, come home to-day.

If you have wandered away from his love
That he offers so full and free,
His arms are outstretched to welcome thee back,

For he never wanders from thee.
Come home to-day, come home to-day,
Weary child, come home to-day.

Thy Father's house is open now,
A feast is richly spread,
And he, in loving-kindness waits
To pour his blessings on thy head.
Come home to-day, come home to-day,
Weary child, come home to-day

O leave the allurements of the world,
For they are short at best;
But come into thy Father's house
For everlasting rest.
Come home to-day, come home to-day,
Weary child, come home to-day.

Away from home! away from God!
O, strange that it should be,
When lovingly the Father stands
And calls "Come unto me."
Come home to-day, come home to-day,
Weary child, come home to-day.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL TEACHER.

FEAR not, dear friend, the texts thou taught,
Where least thou looked, good works have wrought,
By rocky paths through a rich land,
Thou sawest not the Father's hand,
Which sought the golden seed that fell,
By ways and byways led it well,—
O'er hill and vale the impress flew
With all the force its giver knew,
Till by the royal hand 'twas set,
A gem within his coronet,
Within the arc of rosetate light,
Which hangs around the mercy seat
'Twill shed a mellow, holy flush
On her there kneeling at his feet. —A. E. S.

APOCALYPTIC PRECIS.

The Plan of the Book and the Order of the Series of Revelations.

FROM the time that the reins of the world's governments shall be put into the hands of the Lamb for the bringing about of the consummation of God's government of the world, the Gospel will be proclaimed throughout the world, and will go forth conquering everywhere (Seal 1), and in support of its triumph, wars, famines, and pestilences must assist. (Seals 2-4.) But the unbelieving world rises in deadly enmity against the Gospel and its professors, persecutes and murders them, so that their blood cries to God for vengeance, and demands his judgment (5th Seal.) But before this happens, Israel is converted, and finds its preservation on earth; the rest will be #### Translated to Heaven.

Now come upon the earth the terrors of the judgment (Seal 6), which will be followed by the blessed Sabbath rest of the New World (Seal 7) by which the curse of the world reaches the end proposed by God. Thus far reaches the first division of the visions, which gives us in great outlines the whole course of the world from the Ascension of Christ into heaven, until the time when it will have reached its destined end.

With chap. 8: 2 a new division begins which reaches to chap. 11: 18, that is of

The Seven Trumpets.

What relation have they to the Seven Seals? We read in chap. 8: 3, that the angel wafts his incense to God, that the prayers of the saints may find acceptance with him. These are the prayers of which we read (ch. 6: 10). The beginning of the Trumpet-visions, therefore, places us in the time when the voice of the saints, persecuted by the world, reaches the throne of God, and God prepares for the judgment. And the trumpet signs now show us the several blows by which the judgment is carried out. The first four are still comparatively light; they have their measure and their bounds. The First Trumpet strikes a third of the earth, viz., its productions (ch. 8: 7); that of the second, a third of the sea, to injure navigation and commerce (ch. 8: 8); that of the third, affects a third of the fresh waters, and so injures man in his health by vitiating the vegetable creation: while that of the fourth darkens one-third of the heavenly lights, and so sends terror into the hearts of men (ch. 8: 12). They are threatening beginnings of terrible judgments we have here to deal with; they are to see if the world will be warned. But the last three Trumpets, beginning with the eagle, pronouncing are now real judgment-woes upon the whole earth. Now, with the fifth Trumpet sound, a plague, lasting five months, breaks upon all mankind that belongs not to the number of the sealed. Israel is already converted and remains in its own land, preserved from this plague. It is so terrible that men will desire death, but death will not come. It is a terrible judgment: but one that still leaves them the chance of repentance (ch. 9: 1-12). But, as it has not this effect, a more terrible judgment follows (ch. 9: 13). It takes its origin from the world-city, spreads thence over the earth, and one-third of its inhabitants perish. The remainder might make this an occasion for repentance, but it remains hardened. Hence for the Seventh Trumpet there remains only the final judgment. This follows (ch. 11: 15-18), and in this wise: On the one hand, the servants of God receive the promised reward, while the corrupters of the earth receive their deserts, both the living and the dead. We are thus led to the contemplation of the final judgment itself.

The Threefold Woe

The Seal of Seven Trumpets.

By this we learn where and how the seal-visions ought to be placed among the trumpet-visions. The end of them left us at the end of the fifth Seal; after the judgment of the last trumpet, nothing is left to prevent the beginning of the New World, and the time of the Seventh Seal begins. Thus the Seven Trumpets are only an explanation of the Sixth Seal, or a detailed indication of that judgment which is there spoken of only in a general way, and is to teach by what blows the judgment is to proceed; first, by calling to repentance, and then by taking vengeance on those who will not listen.

TO RESCUE THE FALLEN.

Mr. Charles N. Crittenton's Effort to Establish a Chain of Missions Across the Continent for the Rescue of the Fallen.

NEARLY three years ago, in publishing the portrait and life of Mr. Charles N. Crittenton of New York, and an account of the Florence Mission which he founded, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD reported an interview with the philanthropist in which he sketched his future plans. It was his hope, he said, to establish a chain of such missions extending right across the continent, so that wherever vice flourished, there the followers of Christ might have a place from which they could work for the rescue of its victims. Considering how much money and time and labor had been required to establish the Florence Mission in New York, and what a large sum was needed every year to sustain it on the lines which Mr. Crittenton believes alone give promise of success, his idea of multiplying these missions seemed somewhat visionary. It does not seem so visionary to-day. The Examiner of San Francisco, just to hand, describes the visit of Mr. Crittenton to that city and the founding of a Florence Mission there. It reports also that the missions founded by him in San Jose and Sacramento are flourishing and doing beneficent work.

With the story of the commencement of the work our readers are already familiar. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has already told how, desiring to raise a memorial to a dearly loved daughter taken from him by death, Mr. Crittenton conceived the idea of establishing a mission which should bear her name, the object of which should be the rescue of fallen womanhood. Established in the notorious Bleeker Street, New York, it fulfilled the purpose for which it was founded. But it opened before the eyes of its founder a wider need. Since that time, Mr. Crittenton has placed the New York Mission in charge of devoted workers and set out on a tour of the world, that he might study the subject in its manifold forms and learn what plans were being adopted in other lands to counteract the evil. He has visited England, France, Germany, Italy, China, Japan and India, and has come back with much knowledge gleaned by actual observation. "It is here that my work lies," he said to the representative of the journal. "I shall not rest till I see a mission of this kind established in every great city in the United States." New Orleans, Chicago, Cleveland, Cincinnati and Detroit are the cities he proposes to work in at first. He hopes to interest Christian people in those cities in the enterprise; give them the benefit of his experience in New York and the knowledge he has acquired by travel; help them in establishing a mission and arrange plans for co-operation. How valuable such help must be, will be realized by all who have attempted rescue work and have lived to see how many mistakes might have been avoided, and how much more efficient the mission might have been from the start had some experienced adviser been at hand to consult. Mr. Crittenton is delighted to take that position and is glad to accept all invitations to help from Christian people who want to embark in the Christ-like enterprise.

The portrait in this column is that of Mr. James R. Johnston, who is superintendent of the Florence Mission in New York during Mr. Crittenton's absence. Mr. Johnston has had considerable experience in mission work in Philadelphia and other cities, and for some time labored with Mr. Crittenton in the Florence Mission, of which he now has charge

A PLEDGE OF LIFE.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Dec. 13. Comfort from the Story of the Resurrection. John 11:25; 14:19; Phil. 3:10.

IF a man die shall he live again? Long centuries ago Job asked that question, and men have been asking it ever since. The dead seem so utterly beyond the reach of resuscitation that it is not surprising that the question is asked incredulously. Who that has looked on a corpse and has seen decomposition in progress can believe that such a thing as that can live again? He who believes in miracles may expect and hope for it, but none beside. Faith alone furnishes the ground for hope when the great change has passed on the body.

The spectacle of a death may, however, suggest a doubt even to those who deny the possibility of a future life. The change is generally so sudden and so marked. One minute, intelligence looks from the eye, the lips speak words of endearment, the hand returns the clasp of affection, and the next minute all is vacancy. There is no response to appeals which a few minutes before would have awakened the strongest emotion; now, there is no feeling, no consciousness. What has happened? Something has left the flesh. Something invisible, intangible, which was the very essence of being has departed. We turn away from the inanimate form, feeling in every fibre of our being that our loved one is not there. It would be a mockery to call that cold, senseless frame the being we knew and loved. We touch it tenderly and put it away reverently, but our reverence for it is one of association only. It was so closely identified with the loved one, it was the visible, tangible presence, or covering of the being we held dear, but not himself. Then where is he? Did the ego leave that form in the moment of death? He is not here; then where is he? The human being has separated into two distinct parts, and it is of that departed part, not the part that remains with us that we think, when we think of him. With that our hopes lie.

As to that entity what, then, do we know? After leaving the body it gives no evidence, appreciable by the senses of living men, of its continued existence. Socrates and other philosophers have argued from analogy that it does live, but their arguments convince us only that separate existence is probable. They do not produce certainty, and it is certainty that the bereaved mourner craves. He obtains it in Christ. Not by argument, but by authoritative declaration. "He that believeth in me," he said to Martha, "though he were dead yet shall he live." But who is this who assumes to give such a promise? One who himself, in his own person, proved his power. The empty tomb, the living, moving, speaking body, that might be touched and handled were irresistible proofs of that power. Only one step further is necessary and the ground for that is given in the words: "Because I live, ye shall live also." It is the word of a conqueror. Coming unscathed out of the conflict he promises victory to those who trust in him. Thus he brings "immortality to light." The thought thrills the Apostle when he writes of it, and he desires to know the power of that resurrection, to have fellowship in the sufferings and become conformed to that death, that he, too, may attain the resurrection from the dead. That is the goal, and that the path by which it is to be reached. But fellowship in Christ's sufferings pre-supposes the Christ-like spirit, for only such a spirit, unselfish, wholly consecrated to humanity, bearing the burdens of others, could suffer as he suffered, and to be conformed to his death is to die daily to the world and all its ideals. Thus treading the same path the glorious end is attained.

THE Y. M. C. A. IN RICHMOND, VA.

It is gratifying to learn that excellent work is being done in all parts of the South by Young Men's Christian Associations. Virginia especially is to the fore with commodious and beautiful buildings, energetic officers and devoted members. The last report gives the number of Associations in the State as sixty-four of which twelve had been organized within a year. During the same period, eight thousand dollars had been raised toward erecting buildings for Associations which were meeting in edifices they did not own. Evangelistic meetings had been held in several towns with the most blessed results. Evidently Association work in Virginia is very much alive.

the corner of Sixth and Main Streets and covers an area of sixty by one hundred and ten feet. Its cost was $43,000. The aggressive Christian work it is doing in the city is, we are informed, most successful and is highly valued by the pastors of all the churches.

AN EPWORTH LEAGUE IN WISCONSIN.

A CORRESPONDENT writes: "The Epworth League of the Methodist Episcopal Church is rapidly growing in numbers and usefulness in the State of Wisconsin. The town of Kaukauna, Wis., has recently built and dedicated the first hall in that State. It is a gem of architectural beauty, and a present from Mr. N. H. Brokaw. It is thoroughly equipped—containing kitchen, pantry, ladies' parlor, dining and reading-rooms. At the opening, Mr. and Mrs. Brokaw made the public offering; the Rev. Henry Ostrom preached the sermon, and the pastor conducted the service of dedication. Upon the following evening, a grand banquet was given. A library of 1,000 volumes has been donated by the Methodists of Kaukauna, and will soon occupy the beautiful book-cases that line the walls of the reading-room."

AN AFFILIATION IN CANADA.

An effort is being made among the Methodists of Canada to promote a union between the Christian Endeavor Societies already organized in the Methodist Churches and the Epworth League as adopted by the heads of the church. The effort was endorsed by the Ontario Provincial Convention. Mr. J. W. Baer, the secretary of the United Society of Christian Endeavor, has had some correspondence on the subject with Dr. Withrow, of Toronto, who originated the idea of affiliation, and he reports hopefully of the movement in the Golden Rule. He says that the plan is to have the Epworth Leagues, which organized with the old constitution, reorganize with the revised constitution, taking the name Epworth Leagues of Christian Endeavor, as therein suggested, and that Christian Endeavor societies do likewise and adopt the same name, and that all report to Rev. W. H. Withrow, D. D., of Toronto. In that connection, a few sentences from a letter just received from Dr. Withrow will be more than passing interest: "I have pleasure in sending some additional names of Epworth Leagues of Christian Endeavor. You will observe that more than half the leagues now organized are Epworth Leagues of Christian Endeavor. I am doing my best to induce all our leagues to become Epworth Leagues of Christian Endeavor, and you will observe that a resolution of the late convention at Peterborough recommends also that Christian Endeavor societies in Methodist Churches change their names to Epworth Leagues of Christian Endeavor." To this Mr. Baer replies: "Our Methodist Christian Endeavor societies should fall in line readily with this admirable plan, which stands for broad spiritual fellowship. I shall do all that I can to assist Dr. Withrow."

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR IN AFRICA.

THERE is a general impression that the Young People's Societies are adapted chiefly for home work in well organized churches in civilized lands, but it appears they prove useful also in Mission work. It will be remembered that at the recent great Convention at Minneapolis a cablegram was received from Natal in Africa where a Society had been organized by Rev. Charles N. Ransom. The Golden Rule now publishes a letter from him reporting progress. He says:

I fear you can have no idea of how slowly things move in Christian work here in Africa, and how great the barriers, both in numbers and quality, to immediate progress. The mission stations are comparatively far apart, travelling is tedious and expensive, and hence the brisk communication which carries the fire from heart to heart, and from town to town in America is impossible here. The interests of the Society are constantly on my mind. I wish I could spend all my time on this one thing. I long to carry on a correspondence here in Natal and in Cape Colony, which might help in the consideration of the advantages of the Y. P. S. C. E. and future organization. I hear good news from the society in Mapumulo, and the one in Amanzimtote was flourishing while Miss Ireland was there. I hope to be able to bring the interests of the Society to the attention of the mission in such a personal way that good results will follow.

SPREAD OF THE EPWORTH LEAGUE.

The promptitude with which the Methodist Episcopal Church throughout the country has adopted the Epworth League is an evidence of its value and also of the alertness of churches and pastors to appropriate a good thing when they see it. A few facts concerning recent conventions which our friend Rev. Jesse S. Gilbert of Midland Park, N. J., kindly furnishes to us show how the League is flourishing in various sections of the country. In Iowa, the Atlantic District League recently convened at Harlem and reports were received from no less than twenty chapters. In Kansas, at the Convention nearly every church answered to the roll-call and reported large and steady growth. In New York State, League work is making wonderful progress. At the Convention recently held at Adams of that district seventy-five delegates were present and the District President Rev. C. C. Townsend, who presided, was able to congratulate the Convention on the vigorous and rapid development the League has shown in so short a time. The Watertown district which held its Convention at Carthage seemed to be similarly flourishing. In Ohio, a Convention of the Wooster District League was recently held at Doylestown at which Dr. De La Matyr of Akron gave an inspiring and congratulatory address. The League in that District and in the whole State is growing rapidly and will show even more encouraging figures than were then reported at the next Convention which will be held at Wadsworth in June next. In Tennessee the League is adopted in every Conference with enthusiasm. The General Conference which met at Chattanooga Nov. 17-19 and which comprises twelve annual Conferences, listened to testimonies to the value of the League from all the delegates who had witnessed its working and who recommended it strongly.

OLD THINGS ARE BEST.

OLD things are best. We wander
So strangely and so lonely
From here to that world yonder,
Why not grow fonder and fonder
In tried affections only?

Old friends are best. Their faces
Each year seem dearer, dearer,
And grow with new found graces:
Then, ah! the vacant places
But bring the living nearer.

Old homes are best. The laughter
That tells of childhood's pleasures
Beneath the ancient rafter
Surpasses all that's after
And all of manhood's treasures.

UNCLE JOHN'S TALKS.

He Tells About the Golden Gate and the Moslem Traditions Regarding it.

SYMPATHY is a universal sentiment. The painful stories of the Hebrew persecution, that have been published all over the civilized globe, stir up within us a feeling of indignation against those nations that have been the means of inflicting so much suffering upon a race once peculiarly blessed. Even the little ones of the household, listening to these repeated tales of Russian barbarism and Turkish despotism, pour out the tribute of their young hearts in words of sympathy and commiseration.

Uncle John was not greatly surprised, therefore, when he was asked the other evening, by one of the circle not yet far advanced in her teens:

"Will the Jews ever return to Jerusalem?"

"That has been a question asked all over the world for centuries, my dear," he replied, gently. "The hope and prayer of every true Israelite is for the restoration of his race to their own land and to the City of David. And in late years there have been many signs that their return is not far off. But if you were to ask a Moslem about it, he would smile and show his white teeth as he muttered: 'Not while the Golden Gate is closed.'"

"The Golden Gate!" exclaimed the children.

"Yes; the most famous of all the gates of Jerusalem. It is walled up on the outside, and has been so since the Crusades. There is a tradition among the Moslems that if ever Jerusalem is conquered and the followers of Mohammed driven out, the conqueror will enter by the Golden Gate, and so they have walled it up securely. When in Palestine several years ago, I viewed this famous gate with deep interest. It is only walled up on the outside; the inside is really a double gate, and there is a courtyard where the Moslems assemble to worship. The gate is on the eastern side of the city and overlooks the valley of Jehoshaphat. There is another tradition connected with it, too, which the mention of the Valley recalls to my mind. Built into the wall beside the Golden Gate is a great pillar of porphyry, on whose top, according to a Moslem prophecy, Mohammed himself will stand at the last day to judge all the nations who will gather in the valley below. The Gate itself is a double arch of exquisite workmanship, but its surface shows the ravages of time, for it is actually crumbling into dust."

"Why was it called the 'Golden Gate?' " was asked.

"That name came from the fact that it was at one time connected with the one of the gates of the Temple, which, as you know the Bible tells us, were covered with gold. But the name cannot be traced farther back than the Crusades. Originally it was called the Bab-el-Rameh, or Gate of Mercy, and the Moslems speak of it as the Bab-el-Dahariyeh, or Golden Gate. Whatever the original structure may have been, the present gate is unquestionably of Roman origin, and belonged to the enclosure of the Temple built by the Emperor Hadrian upon Mount Moriah. The ancient name

'Gate of Mercy' was a peculiarly appropriate one, for it was by this gate, according to sacred history, that Jesus entered Jerusalem riding upon an ass, and the populace met him with palms in their hands, greeting him as a king. From the portals of the gate, one may see the winding road to Bethany, along which the Saviour came with his disciples that day. At the time of the Crusades the gate, which had then been discontinued as a thoroughfare, was opened once a year—on Palm Sunday—to allow the procession to pass through.

"Among the exiled Hebrews, the memory of the Holy City is kept alive by the recital of its ancient glories and of the promises for the fulfilment of which they pray daily. The song sung by the captives in Babylon is still echoing in the hearts of their descendants scattered all over the world:

lievers crowding its portals, through which the Moslems will have passed forever."

Lessons of Self-denial.

CHILDREN of the present day, writes H. Clay Trumbull, in Hints on Child Training, especially children of parents in comfortable circumstances, are far more likely than were their fathers and mothers to lack lessons of self-denial. The standard of living now is very different now from a generation since. There were few parents in any community fifty years ago, who could buy whatever they wanted for their children, or indeed for themselves. There was no such freeness of purchases, for the table, for the house, or the household as is now common on every side. Children then did not expect a new suit of clothes every month or two months. Often they had old ones made over for them from those of their parents or their elder brothers or sisters. There was still less planning by them for a summer journey with their parents to a mountain or a seaside resort. Self-denial or more or less of personal privation came as a necessity to almost every child in the younger days of many who are now on the stage of life. But how different now! It is every parent's duty to deny a child many things which he wants; to teach him that he must get along without a great many things that may seem very desirable; to train him to self denial and endurance at table, in the playroom with companions, and away from them; and the doing of this duty by the parent brings

But is it exactly borrowing to go to mother's room and take a handkerchief without leave? You and your sisters will always have more sincere regard for each other if each has respect for the other's possessions. It is not pleasant for you to find that your favorite handkerchief, or your pretty muff or much-needed hat pin, is missing when you wish to use one of them. Book borrowers are so numerous and so generally careless that reform in their case seems almost hopeless. Or have you an art study or a roll of music long ago borrowed? Return it right away. It is not so much that the article may be needed, though that is a sufficient reason for returning it, but an untidy habit of failure in this respect will lead you to be careless and neglectful about more important matters.

PASSING YOUTH.

MOTHERS the world over naturally feel sad when their babies are children no longer, when the son steps out of the soft, pleasing light of childhood and into the stronger day of full manhood, when the daughter hesitates,

Standing, with reluctant feet,
Where womanhood and childhood meet.

The time comes when, some day, the mother, who fair would keep her children by her always, realizes that they are lost to her. "What mother," writes the Rev. J. F. Elder in Work at Home, does not appreciate this subtle conceit of the poet:

In your small dreaming dresses of white,
With the wild bloom you gathered to-day

In your quiet, shut hands, from the light
And the dark you will wander away.

With less gold and more gloom in the hair,
When the buds have unfolded to flowers,
These faces may wake here as fair,
But older than yours by hours.

"Thus they are taken from us unconsciously and irresistibly. We cannot hide them from their destiny—from confronting life, with its cruel and crushing possibilities. They are early initiated into sickness and sorrow. Then come the perils of street and school; for mother cannot always watch, or be teacher. Presently they must seek a livelihood, and here wider and sometimes more vicious associations confront them.

"What ark shall we take for their shelter? Give them the memory of a happy home. It will be a safeguard and an inspiration. It was when he recalled his childhood's home that the prodigal came to himself and returned to his father's house. Be careful of their health. Don't coddle, don't overwork, don't over-feed, don't allow them the dissipations of society too young. Ground them in good principles—truthfulness, a keen instinct for honesty, a hatred of all forms of gambling, implicit obedience to authority. Inculcate temperance, by example and self-control, in all things."

Mournful People.

THERE are some people who seem to be afflicted with melancholia all their lives. The spirit of mournfulness pervades their every conscious act, and if in some moment of forgetfulness they permit themselves to be cheerful, they instantly assume their sad, familiar faces when they become fully conscious again. While such doubly-dolorous folks are bad enough to have in the house, they are ten times worse to have in meeting. Says a recent writer: "These mournful brethren are the death of the prayer-meeting. They look so doleful that a sight of them throws a chill over every one. Their voices are always in the minor key. They are full of lamentation and mourning. The degeneracy of the times, the backslidden condition of the church, the frivolities of the people,—all these weigh upon their spirits, and form the burden of their prayers and songs. They love to sing:

What peaceful hours I once enjoyed,
How sweet their memory still:
But they have left an aching void
The world can never fill.

Such people can get to heaven, but they kill a good many religious meetings, and discourage a great many faithful souls on the way."

THE "BABEL-EL-DAHARIYEH" OR GOLDEN GATE OF JERUSALEM.
(From a photograph secured by Dr. Talmage in the Holy Land.)

Jerusalem, if I thee forget
Skill part from my right hand.

Everything points to their return to their own land before the close of the century. But they will return in unbelief. Not till they have rebuilt the Temple and restored its ancient glories will they be brought to know that the Messiah has come and that Christ, the rejected one, is he for whom Israel has looked these many generations. Then we may expect to see the Golden Gate reopened and true bea sure advantage to the child. Whatever else he has, a child ought not to lack this element of wise training.

A Word About Borrowing.

"MAY I not borrow from mother or sister?" you ask. Most assuredly, borrow if you must, though one never loves a constant borrower or solicitor of favors, and one should endeavor to get out of difficulty unaided if possible.

SUMMARY OF THE PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Aleph, a young Chaldean student, of a notable family arrives in Alexandria with his friend and companion, Cimon, a Greek, who has visited the city many years previously. During the journey down the Nile, the latter points out the various places of interest to Aleph. Egypt is under Roman rule, and the period is early in the first century of the Christian era. On landing, the friends encounter an aged Egyptian, Seti, to whom a drunken Roman officer is about to offer violence, when Aleph disarms the latter, very skillfully. Seti is grateful to the youth and on leaving him warns him that he has made an enemy of the dissipated son of Flaccus the Roman Governor of the city. He also cautions him against Flaccus and also against Malus, a crafty Jewish trader of great influence. The two friends pass some time in viewing the sights of the city, after which Aleph, who is there on highly important business matters, seeks the great banker Alexander. Before visiting him, however, he learns some interesting facts regarding the man he is to see. Alexander is the Alabarch, or representative head of the orthodox Hebrews of Alexandria, a man of great wealth and influence, to whom the magnates of all nationalities, and even the government officials themselves, frequently resort for financial aid. His place of business is a vast, imposing building of great strength, and here at times come students, travelers with letters of credit, merchants and others. Aleph visits Alexander and meets Rachel, the banker's beautiful daughter. Aleph on concluding his business, accepts Alexander's invitation to come to the Diapleuston Synagogue on the following day. At the Synagogue, impressive services conclude, with an address by one Simon, just returned from Jerusalem, who tells the congregation about Jesus, concerning whom he made full inquiry and touching whose Divine nature the Jews were divided. A party of Roman soldiers invade the Diapleuston, and attempting to compel the Alabarch and worshippers to render divine homage to an image of the Emperor Tiberius, were forcibly expelled, Aleph and Cimon taking an active part in the ejection. On leaving the synagogue, the two friends are followed by a stranger whom they interrogate.

CHAPTER V. (Continued.)

"WELL," said Cimon, good-humoredly, "since we have now gratified your curiosity, perhaps you will not refuse to gratify ours by telling us who you are, and whom you suppose this young man to resemble."

"That is but fair," returned the Jew. "I keep a khan at the end of this street, near the gate of Canopus, as did my father before me. When I was a youth, there came to our place from Judea a caravan of eastern people, evidently of great distinction, on their way homeward by the Red Sea route. It was in this company that I saw a man whose appearance made such an impression on me that if I were a painter I could put him on canvas to-day; and this young man is his double—perhaps somewhat brightened by youth."

"I have to confess," said Aleph with a smile, "that I am a Chaldean; and also that all Chaldeans have a certain likeness to one another. But you must not forget that the imagination is a powerful faculty, especially among us Orientals, and has sometimes been known to see things that did not exist. But you can see for yourself, without any help from your imagination, that the peculiar way in which this conference has come about has attracted the notice of the street, and that the curious are beginning to thicken about us. So now let us separate; but, as soon as our affairs permit, we will seek you out and hear further about the pilgrims of whom you speak."

So they parted. But the incident, especially after reflection and conference early the next morning, determined the friends to withdraw as fully as possible from the Jewish and Roman quarters of the city, and to hasten certain inquiries as to Malus.

There are two kinds of prophecy—the natural and the supernatural. The latter is a spark from the Divine foreknowledge, granted occasionally to certain privileged persons. That our friends had anything of this I am not prepared to say; but they were reasonably well furnished with such foresight as reason and experience can give; and what they foresaw was very considerable annoyance and even danger if they should remain at their present quarters. So they determined to remove. This was not valor, certainly. As certainly it was not cowardice. But it was that good thing which we call prudence, and which sensible people think to be almost or quite as good as heroism itself. It was a wise precaution—the tacking of the ship when breakers are seen ahead, the putting on of armor when the arrows begin to fly, the striking tent and removing to higher ground when the morning sky is red and lowering, and there is a sound of abundance of rain.

Have I said that the strangers were in the habit of asking each morning for Divine guidance during the day? If not, I ought to have said it. And the habit was no empty form. When they had risen from their knees, they seemed free from anxiety as to what might happen, though not free from forethought and a disposition to be very active in pursuit of their objects. Queer people, were they not? Some would say they were very absurd as well as queer. However this may be, it is certain that Aleph and his friend did not stir a step that morning, even in the matter of planning, till they had sought leading from a wisdom above their own. And what they did that morning they may be counted on to do every morning while we follow their fortunes. Will it be of any service to them? Perhaps they have found in their Septuagint several passages like this, "Commit thy way unto the Lord and he shall direct thy paths."

Perhaps Cimon found more difficulty than his young companion in keeping free from anxiety on account of what had occurred. He felt a responsibility for both.

"It seems unfortunate," said he, after their devotions, "not only that we should have been brought again into collision with the Romans, who can do so much to hinder at least one of our objects, but that it has come about in such a way as to attract to us the notice of the whole Jewish community. For, of course, yesterday's events will be public talk to-day, and everybody will be inquiring and surmising about the strangers. And I am very much afraid that Malus has already caught a spark that in such a gale will set all his suspicions and craft on fire. But as these seemingly untoward things could not well have been avoided by us, I cannot but hope that the untowardness is only in seeming. I have lived long enough to know that Divine leading can brighten seeming perils and disasters into blessings. But it seems a reasonable condition of Divine guidance that we try to act as prudently as we can, from the human stand-point. And prudence seems to require that we at once remove to the Egyptian quarter; that you matriculate in the University, and thus secure its immunities for yourself, as well as meet the wishes of your father that you hear for yourself the scholars of the west; and that I proceed without delay to make the inquiries we need to make in regard to Malus. These inquiries will have to be made as quietly and rapidly as possible; for if he should take the alarm, his craft and influence are evidently such that he might seriously embarrass our movements—if not baffle them."

And so it came to pass that the early morning found them established in a quiet khan, almost under the shadow of the Serapeum.

This does not localize them very definitely; for the Serapeum cast a very great shadow. The temple, or rather collection of temples, was, by all odds, the most imposing structure in Alexandria. It was built on an elevation, partly artificial, the ascent to which on three sides was by broad flights of steps and successive platforms; while on the north side the ascent began at the harbor and advanced by a grade easy for vehicles to the great propylon. This was purely Egyptian. To the right and left of it rose walls of syenite, high and massive enough to be the walls of a city, decorated with many towers, and inclosing the whole levelled summit of the hill with their somewhat irregular lines. Within these, at a little distance, and built of the same, though much finer and carefully wrought, stone, rose the complicated structures of the temple proper. It was a little city by itself. And, towering above all other structures, it seemed to protect Alexandria and defy the seas beyond.

Like most Egyptian structures it was most successful in giving to beholders the ideas of massiveness and vastness. Yet the airiness of the situation, combined with a mingling of the various Hellenic architectures with the Egyptian, seemed to relieve the ponderous pile of any air of heaviness. For Pharaohs and Ptolemies, Mother Isis and her vagrant daughters Doris and Ione and Cora, were all represented in the confused mass of templed structures designed to welcome all the classical creeds.

The most striking features of the temple, to one looking up to it from the street, were, perhaps, an enormous canopy that seemed to overhang the whole pile of buildings and a tower by its side that rose still higher. This tower was the famous observatory where Eratosthenes and Hipparchus had made their observations; and in the spacious halls at its base was deposited the greater part of the then existing Alexandrian library—consisting of some 200,000 works collected by the Ptolemies, together with 300,000 parchments brought from Pergamos by Mark Antony for Cleopatra.

The Serapeum was under Egyptian control, but was greatly revered by devout Greeks and Romans as well as by Egyptians. Each nation regarded the god to whom the temple was dedicated and whose statue of mingled marble and silver and gold was there enshrined, as being the chief of all its gods—the Egyptians calling it Osiris, the Greeks Zeus, and the Romans Jupiter. For some reason, of late years, this statue had been kept in a dark room, and was seldom, if ever, shown to the people at large. They worshipped without the presence of any visible symbol of deity. The priests were numerous and of the highest rank. The chief of all was primate of all Egypt.

To its religious character the Serapeum added that of an institution of learning. Its priests had among their own people the reputation for wisdom which belonged to the ancient Egyptian priesthood among all nations—and not without reason. Their priestly duties being light, they spent much time in studying the sciences and philosophies as then known, and in training young priests to the same. In addition, the more eminent among them taught on certain topics in the Alexandrian School. They were recognized by the Ptolemies, and afterward by the emperors, as in all respects peers of the teachers located at the Museum.

Indeed, among people religiously inclined their standing was altogether superior to that of the secular professors. They were far more sober and practical in their teachings. They more boldly recognized religion and taught on lines parallel with it. They had stricter notions of what could properly be called science and philosophy. A few facts blown up into prettily colored bubbles, and then tossed into the air on exhibition, and then collapsing, and then succeeded by another output of pretty emptinesses, and this by another, and so on—such were the substance and history of the better part of the ever-changing teaching of the Museum. The worse part had no foundation in facts at all. In fact, facts were scorned. They were vulgar. The lofty name of wisdom should be given only to great general institutions and the logical deductions from them. And as the teachers were by no means careful in either their premises or their processes, their conclusions were apt to be worthless when they were not pernicious. In short, the Museum was the child of Athens and the mother of Germany.

Accordingly, many of the noblest families in the neighboring countries turned their faces toward the Serapeum. They were disgusted at the laborious trifling. They were alarmed at the decay of faith. If their sons could not have something that deserved to be called knowledge, and knowledge without impiety and all the terrors, they did not want them to have it at all. But if they could have it thoroughly leavened with religious ideas—why, they would welcome it, be very glad of it, pour out for it their shekels or sesterii or staters freely. Such people found what they wanted in the priest-teachers of the Serapeum; and said to themselves that if religion is the supreme wisdom then are the ministers of religion the supreme professors.

All this Cimon recalled and spoke of when he found himself in the neighborhood of the temple. And he proposed that Aleph should matriculate there instead of at the Museum—as being the nearer and more conservative branch of the University, as well as more remote from the Roman headquarters.

"I do not think," said he, "that you will need to confine yourself very closely to the routine of lectures. Many of the more advanced students do not. You are already familiar through me with the main subjects discussed in both the Athenian and Alexandrian Schools; and I do not imagine you will hear much that is new; only you will hear the old said in a new way, with new illustrations and personal modifications, which is not without its advantage to a young man. And you will have what, perhaps, is a still greater advantage, that of mingling with and studying the leading young men of the West. As to the present preliminaries for admission to the School, you had better apply to Seti for information."

"And why not ask his advice, also," said Aleph, "as to how you had better proceed in the affair of Malus? It would be a safe thing to do. The priest is not in love with the trader."

"Perhaps," returned the Greek, "this is the best thing to be done. Still I feel reluctant to do it—at least till I have proved it necessary. It is a good rule not to call on others to help you till you have tried to help yourself. We must spare our friends as much as possible. And I do not see that any harm can be done by my going directly to the custom house and inquiring on what terms abstracts from the records can be made, or by my going to leading dealers and asking how the prices of goods have ruled in Alexandria for a term of years. Let me cautiously feel my way about to-day by myself; by the evening I shall be better able to see whether we need to call in help from outside."

As soon as Cimon had gone, Aleph inquired of the landlord at what part of the temple he should present himself. Climbing successive flights of steps that began almost at the khan, he came to the broad carriage-way of which we have spoken. As yet very few people could be seen upon it—none who seemed moving to the temple. This led him to think that very likely he was yet too early for the temple habits, and had better linger a little before seeking admittance. So he sat down on one of the stone seats, placed at intervals by the wayside for the convenience of the weary and the idle, and proceeded to study at his leisure the stately facade of the temple. While thus engaged he heard voices just back of the wall against which he was leaning.

A voice laughed heartily.

"Have you been at your cups so early?" said another voice, testily. "I should have thought that these leeks and onions would have set you to crying. That is what they do to me."

"Oh, it was such a capital thing! Why, the very gods themselves must be shaking with laughter—at least our Egyptian gods."

"Who ever heard of an Egyptian god laughing? Our deities never did that in the best days of the country. They who were as grim as fate when Thebes was in its glory are not likely to smile now when Thebes is dead, and a Roman garrison is in Alexandria, and a Roman Governor in the place of Seti."

"That is just it—now you are coming to the point!" cried the other; "it is just because there is a Roman garrison in Alexandria and a Roman Proprietor in the ancestral palace of Seti that our gods, calm and grave as they generally are, must have had a merry time of it yesterday."

"There, take that, you provoking Sphinx!" (and Aleph heard something strike against the wall). "If you do not expound your riddle right away it will be not two onions that your empty head will get, but a basket of them."

"Do you pretend to say that you have not heard what took place yesterday at the Diapleuston? Why, the whole city is ringing with it—at least the Jewish Quarter. The Roman Quarter will be silent enough, I warrant."

"Have heard nothing. Was in Canopus yesterday—came back before people were stirring this morning. What is it? Out with it, man!"

"And you be a true son of Egypt, now open your ears and mouth! Yesterday the Governor took a hundred soldiers and tried to make the Jews at the Diapleuston worship an image of the emperor. A magnificent young man in shining armor suddenly appeared on the scene, disarmed Flaccus, and encouraged the Jews to give the whole party a good drubbing. Which they did. The Romans were pommelled within an inch of their lives, then tumbled into the street, and then chased on a full run quite to Bruchium. Gods! what a treat to see Flaccus run! I would have given ten years of my life to see it. And now it is said that Alexander, the favorite banker of the emperor, and heavier with him than all the pyramids put together, has just written to the governor demanding an apology for his behavior; and threatening to report him to the emperor."

A Subscriber, South Coventry, Conn. In the Book of Revelation we read of the New Jerusalem in which there is no sickness, for only the redeemed are there, and we read of the Tree of Life, the leaves of which are used for the healing of the nations. Who will they be that need healing?

Doubtless those who have just arrived there.

Mrs. H. L. Glass, Walker, Linn Co., Iowa. Is it healthful to keep house-plants in a sleeping-room?

In some cases, where the plants are of an atmosphere-purifying character, their presence would be healthful. In others, they would be positively a detriment to health. A botanist or probably a physician could give accurate advice on this matter. It is recorded that a Viennese lady of rank died from the effect of air-poisoning, caused by the presence of a mass of fragrant plants in her boudoir.

Subscriber, Tulare City, Cal. Is a Christian minister justified in marrying a divorced person when the divorce has been obtained on the ground of abandonment, and when there was ground for the graver charge, but it was not alleged, lest the scandal should injure the children?

We think he would be justified. The question on which it is necessary for him to satisfy himself is, whether the person asking to be married has been divorced in the sight of God. If he believes that the sin, which the Scriptures recognize as justifying divorce, has been committed, then he is right in re-marrying the person who suffered the wrong, even though the divorce may have been granted by the courts on other grounds.

S. S. Scholar, Lower Gilmanton, N. H. 1. Who were the wise men who went to Jerusalem at the birth of the Saviour? 2. How did they know he was worthy of divine adoration? Had they data in regard to the prophecies concerning Christ? 2. Why did John, after having positive proof that Jesus was the Son of God, send two of his disciples and say to him: "Art thou he that should come or do we look for another?" 3. At what time did the Christian Sabbath supersede the Jewish Sabbath, and by whom was the change made?

1. The wise men were Melchior, Caspar and Balthazar. They were doubtless students of prophecy and acquainted with all the Scriptures relating to the coming of our Saviour. 2. John probably intended that they should satisfy themselves by personal contact with him. 3. See answer to Mrs. J. D., in No. 28 of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Alex. Kennet, Trenton, O. Why is not the washing of feet practiced in the Churches? Is it not as essential for the salvation of souls as the Communion service?

Footwashing was an ancient obligatory rite of Eastern hospitality. In John 13: 12, the Saviour is represented as performing this lowly service to his disciples. The principle involved is that love dignifies any service, however humble. In the early Christian Church it was observed as a duty. Luther opposed it as leading to hypocrisy, and the Lutheran Consistory of 1718 publicly condemned it. Several sects including Anabaptists, Moravians, and Mennonites, still regard it as a positive ordinance. It never obtained general recognition except in the East, where sandals are worn and the feet are peculiarly liable to be soiled by dust, etc. These causes do not exist in colder climates. Neither it nor the Communion service is essential to salvation.

J. De Vull, Gansevoort, N. Y. Was Pharaoh drowned in the Red Sea? If so, where did they get his mummy which is on exhibition?

All the evidence is against the theory that Pharaoh was drowned in the Red Sea. Some very interesting information, furnishing striking confirmation of the Bible narrative, has recently been obtained, by deciphering the inscriptions on ancient Egyptian monuments. From these it appears that the Pharaoh who "refused to let the people go" was named Menephtha. He was the youngest son of the great Pharaoh, Rameses II, the Pharaoh who oppressed the Hebrews and ordered the killing of the male infants, and whose death is mentioned in Exodus 2: 23. Menephtha was an old man, at least sixty, when he came to the throne, and was constitutionally timid and feeble. He joined with him in the government his brilliant son Seti, a young man resembling in person and character of his grandfather, the great Rameses. Seti was virtually king through his father, Menephtha, was king in name. The Bible alludes to Seti as "the firstborn of Pharaoh who sat on the throne." (Exodus 12: 29.) This young man's tomb has been found, and a record of his achievements, showing him to have been a great general and administrator. But his name does not appear in the list of the Pharaohs and the inscription on his tomb shows that he never became king, but died suddenly, while still only a prince. The Bible tells us how he died. It was on the night when the angel slew the firstborn. Menephtha, as we know by the Bible narrative, pursued the Hebrews. He had no son now to take command as on former occasions. He was then an old man eighty-two years of age. What more likely than that, when he saw the Israelites descend into the Red Sea, he should send on his army and stay behind himself, not caring at his age, and at night to undertake so perilous a journey. The Egyptian records state that once before, on the eve of battle, when he should have led his army, the old man had a convenient vision, ordering him not to enter the battle but to give the command to his son. He doubtless excused himself on this occasion and so saved his life. A parallel case of a father and son reigning simultaneously is found in Belshazzar, who though exercising kingly functions, does not appear on the list of kings. He was associated in government with his father, Nabonnedus, and, like Seti in Egypt, died before his father. How he died Daniel tells us in his fifth chapter.

Harvey Haven, Chicago, Ill. A farmer finds that owing to the peculiar condition of the weather his whole one thousand acres of wheat ripen at once, though sown at different times. He strives his best to harvest the crop, but Saturday night finds a full day's cutting of one hundred acres yet to be done, grain so ripe that a storm would shell it all out and destroy it; the barometer and other reliable tests indicate a storm. He works all the next day (Sunday) and harvests the wheat. Within an hour after the last shock is up, the storm commences, and continues until thousands of acres of his neighbor's standing wheat were totally destroyed. Did he "do well on that Sabbath day" and therefore not violate it, (Matt. 12: 12) and would saving the property (ox) on the Sabbath, of Luke 14: 5 justify this farmer in saving his grain on the Sabbath?

Conscience alone can decide whether such a course is justifiable as a work of necessity; but there are many Christians who rather than desecrate the Sabbath even in such a desperate case as our correspondent presents, would be satisfied to suffer heavy loss.

J. W. F., Hanover, Ala. If a man commits a murder and is tried and condemned, and afterward repents and God forgives him, ought he to be hanged? If God forgives him ought not men to do so, too?

Whether mercy should be extended to a condemned murderer, or whether the law should take its course, is decided by the Governor of his State who should be guided in coming to a decision by the circumstances attending the crime rather than by the criminal's subsequent behavior. The administration of justice could not be carried on if a criminal could escape the penalty of his crime by pleading that God had forgiven him. Every murderer would make the plea and there would be no way of testing the truth of it.

G. L., Rockford, Ill. 1. How can it be that Jesus was in the earth three days and three nights if he was buried on Friday and rose on Sunday? 2. Who first changed the day of rest from the seventh day to the first day?

The Jews were in the habit of speaking of parts of days as whole days. An example of this is found in II. Chron. 10: 5 and 12. The men were told (verse 5) to come after three days, and we are told (verse 12) they came on the third day. They had the same habit of speaking as to years. (Compare Deut. 14: 28 with 26: 12.) Thus Christ rose on the third day as is stated in other passages. (See Matt. 16: 21; 20: 19; Mark 9: 31; Luke 18: 33, etc.) The time would be counted as part of Friday, one day, Saturday, two days, Sunday morning, three days, or the third day. The phrase three days and three nights is probably the English equivalent of the Hebrew expression often used instead of days, "three evenings—mornings." (2.) The custom of devoting the first instead of the seventh day to worship originated with the Apostles. (See Acts 20: 7; I. Cor. 16: 2.) As the seventh day commemorated the rest of God at the Creation, the first day commemorated the resurrection of the Lord; and Christ honored the observance of it by appearing to the Church on that day during the interval between his resurrection and his ascension. (See John 20: 19.) According to the custom mentioned in the previous answer, the day referred to in John 20: 26 was doubtless also Sunday, that being the eighth day or, as a Jew would have said after eight days. The Emperor Constantine, in A. D. 321, enacted the first law making Sunday the legal day of cessation from business,

A TREATY WITH KING MESSENAH.

The Hillmen had stopped about two hundred yards off, and were drawn up in two lines, shouting and dancing and hurling taunting remarks at their neighbors. The stolen cattle were bunched together back of the king. As Stedman walked steadily forward, with his handkerchief fluttering, and howling out something in their mother-tongue, they stopped and listened. As he advanced, his three companions followed him about fifty yards from the Hillmen before they made out what he said, and then one or the young braves, resenting it as an insult to his chief, shot an arrow at him. Stedman dodged the arrow and stood his ground without even taking a step backward, only turning slightly to put his hands to his mouth and to shout something to his companions, which sounded like "About time to begin on the goats." But the instant the young man had fired, King Messenwah swung his club and knocked him down, and none of the others moved. Then Messenwah advanced before his men to meet Stedman, and on Stedman's opening his hands to show that he was unarmed, the King threw down his club and came forward as empty-handed as himself.

"Ah!" gasped Bradley, Jr., with his finger trembling on his lever, "let me take a shot at him now." Gordon struck the man's gun up, and walked forward in all the glory of his gold-and-blue uniform; for both he and Stedman now saw that Messenwah was more impressed by their appearance and the fact that they were white men, than with any threats of immediate war. So when he saluted Gordon haughtily, that young man gave him a haughty nod in return and bade Stedman tell the King he would permit him to sit down. The King did not appear to like this, but he sat down, nevertheless, and nodded his head gravely.

Strange cases cured by my Medical Discovery come to me every day. Here is one of Paralysis—Blindness—and the Grip. Now how does my Medical Discovery cure all these? I don't know, unless it takes hold of the Hidden Poison that makes all Humors

VIRGINIA CITY, NEVADA, Sept. 9th, 1891.

Donald Kennedy—Dear Sir: I will state my case to you: About nine years ago I was paralyzed in my left side, and the best doctors gave me no relief for two years, and I was advised to try your Discovery, which did its duty, and in a few months I was restored to health. About four years ago I became blind in my left eye by a spotted cataract. Last March I was taken with La Grippe, and was confined to my bed for three months. At the end of that time, as in the start, then it struck me that your Discovery was the thing for me; so I got a bottle, and before it was half gone I was able to go to my work in the mines. Now in regard to my eyes, as I lost my left eye, and about six months ago my right eye became affected with black spots over the sight as did the left eye—perhaps some twenty of them—since I have been using your Discovery they all left my right eye but one; and, thank God, the bright light of heaven is once more making its appearance in my left eye. I am wonderfully astonished at it, and thank God and your Medical Discovery.

Because Catarrh affects your head, it is not therefore a local disease. If it did not exist in your blood, it could not manifest itself in your nose. #### HUNGERING HEARTS.*

SOME hearts go hungering through the world,
And never find the love they seek;
Some lips with pride or scorn are curled
To hide the pain they may not speak.
The eye may flash, the mouth may smile,
The voice in gladdest music thrill,
And yet, beneath them, all the while,
The hungry heart be pining still.

O, eager eyes which gaze afar!
O arms, which clasp the empty air!
Not all unmarked your sorrows are,
Not all unpitied your despair.
Smile patient lips, so proudly dumb,
When life's frail tent at last is furled,
Your glorious recompense shall come,
O hearts that hunger through the world!

SUBTERRANEAN FIRES.†

THE geologist knows many facts which go to show that at a little depth beneath the earth's crust, in the outer verge of the high temperatures which exist in the earth's interior, rocky matter in a state of more or less complete fusion, is able to move with exceeding ease for great distances beneath the crust. The best evidence we find of such subterranean movements is afforded by volcanic ejections. The quantity of matter extruded by a volcano is very great. Thus in the case of Etna—a volcano of the second order of terrestrial cones—it seems likely, from certain computations which rest upon approximate data, that somewhere about 4,000 cubic miles of matter must have been ejected during the brief geological history of that cone—a history which extends back only to the early stages of the Tertiary period, or as we may say to the geological yesterday. We thus have the surprising fact that there may be discharged during the course of a few geological periods an amount of matter sufficient to cover the States of Massachusetts and Rhode Island to the depth of nearly half a mile.

MOUNTAINS AND SLAVERY.

THE effect of the Appalachian mountain system upon the distribution of slavery, and consequently upon the political and social history of this country, was of great importance. Slavery, as is well known, depended for its extension upon two important crops, both of which demanded a large amount of cheap labor. The institution rested on the industries of cotton and tobacco-growing. Only where one of these crops could be profitably tilled, did it ever firmly establish itself. A glance at the map will show that the Appalachian system widens as we go southward from Pennsylvania, until it occupies nearly one-fifth of the Southern States. In this section the character of the soil and form of the surface, and the climate, make the land unsuited for the extended culture of either tobacco or cotton. The result was that slavery never firmly established itself as an economic institution in any part of this vast territory. Here and there in the most fertile valleys a few slaves were employed; but there are counties in this area where a slave was never held. The natural result of this distribution in the negro population was that the mountain districts of the South were separated in their political motives from the plain country.

LONGEVITY IN AMERICA.

THE longevity of people in America is at least as great as in Europe. And this, despite the fact that men's lives in this country are more seriously taxed than in the Old World. We are supposed to be dying of overwork; but the fact is that, witnessed by the duration of life in the case of men who have appeared on the records of insurance companies, there is no indication that the term allotted to man is growing less in this country than it is across the seas. On the contrary, the evidence seems to point to the conclusion that the American man lives longer than those of the same race in the Old World. The rude experience of war indicates that our men are as enduring as any from other countries. But there is a considerable difference in the men born in the different parts of the United States. Measurements appear to show that the size of man increases, in a general way, as we go from the seaboard into the Mississippi Valley. Our race is safe upon this continent; we need have no apprehensions concerning the effect of the existing conditions upon its development. We may safely presume that the climate and other features of our continent—with perhaps the exception of the district about the Gulf of Mexico and the Arctic country—are, on the whole, as well fitted for the uses of northern Europeans as any part of the mother-country. We may reasonably conclude that it suits the whole Teutonic branch of the Aryan race.

BABY BARTY AND MOTHER MIDGE.*

"My dear young lady," she said, gently, "shall I tell you about him? Miss Wilmot found him; she finds them all. He was a mere baby; and nearly skin and bone when he came here. He and a sister a year or two older, were turned on the streets to beg, and the brute who owned them. I believe she called herself their mother, only the dumb beasts have more compassion on their young—had turned them out-of-doors to sleep. Oh! you look shocked, but one sees such cases in the paper. The little creatures were found on a doorstep one evening. Deb had taken off her frock to wrap around Barty, who was ill and coughing. Well, he did not last long; one could not wonder at that, after all that exposure and ill-usage; but we made him very happy as long as he lived. 'Mother Midge' was the name he gave me. No one knew what it meant, but Deb taught it to others. Well, I was sitting with him on my lap, one afternoon—I knew the end was near—and I was talking to him and Deb about heaven—for they were just like heathens—and, baby as he was, Barty was as clever and 'cute as possible. Just as I was talking, I felt his little, bony hand creep to my neck. 'I don't want no 'eavens' he whispered, hoarsely. 'I'd like better to stop along o' Deb and Mother Midge.' Those were his last words. But may be he has changed his mind since then," finished the little woman, softly.

BOOKS WITH A MISSION.

In these times of publishing activity, when hundreds of books, good, bad, and indifferent, are sent forth weekly to tempt the reading public, it is a positive satisfaction to have one's attention called to books that have a mission; books that are a pleasure to read and a gratification to lend. Prof. Drummond's come under this head; so also do the following:

Thoughts for Weary Hours.

Containing 78 short articles in prose and verse, which touch the depths of the Christian experience, as few such volumes do. The articles are evidently all from the same pen; thoroughness, fervor and an uplifting strain being the striking characteristics of each. The little volume is affectionately dedicated "to all those who in this transitory life are in trouble, sorrow, need, sickness or any other adversity." Price, 25 cts.

Little Things in Everyday Life.

A clever brochure which with charm and strength discourses on duties, cares, efforts, sins, pleasures and kindnesses. The many readers of Prof. Drummond's booklets will appreciate this one fully. Tenth thousand now selling. Price 25 cents.

What's the Use of Going to Church?

One of the most telling pamphlets on non-church attendance ever published. It is written by the Rev. Dr. Holland of St. Louis, and is in his best vein—clear, pungent, and very striking. Read it yourself and scatter a few among friends. Neatly printed, with illustrated cover. Price, 10 cents, or $1.00 per dozen.

These booklets are worth buying. Send postage stamps for sums under one dollar. Address

MASON & HAMLIN

Examine the new Mason & Hamlin Piano and Organ catalogues, sent free to any address. The Mason & Hamlin Grand and Upright Pianos are constructed on an Improved Method of Stringing, invented and exclusively used by Mason & Hamlin, by which remarkable purity of tone and great durability are secured, and phenomenal capacity to stand in tune. The LIN SCREW, MASON & HAMLIN'S STRINGER was patented in July, 1883, and is a veritable triumph for American ingenuity, being pronounced by experts "the greatest improvement of the century" in pianos. American Pianos and Organs are superior to all others. Mason & Hamlin Organs have long been the Standard the world over. The Mason & Hamlin Piano is fast becoming as famous as the MASON & HAMLIN ORGAN, and illustrates that HIGHEST STANDARD OF EXCELLENCE which has always characterized the instrument, and won for it the Highest Honors at all great World's Exhibitions since Paris, 1867. Illustrated catalogues free.

Without under-estimating the improvements effected by others in pianos, the Mason & Hamlin STRINGER is claimed to be the greatest improvement of them all, and without it the highest attainable excellence is simply impossible.

A WORLD'S FAIR APPEAL.

From Dr. Talmage's Thanksgiving Day Sermon at Brooklyn Tabernacle, Nov. 26, 1891.

AND now on this Thanksgiving Day of 1891, I charge you people of Brooklyn and New York and America, get ready for the year 1893 when our national prosperity will be set forth as never before in the "World's Columbian Exposition." See here! It is high me that we sea-coast cities, who failed to get the World's Fair, come out of our sulks, and instead of our standing with the face to the wall in a big pout, turn round and join in the upendous enterprise, and by pulpit, and printing press, by legislative enactment, and public-spiritedness of utterance, help on what will be either with us or without us the mightiest Exposition ever seen: the London, Vienna, the Paris Fairs a child's pin-wheel now compared with it. Mark these two thoughts: the Fair at Chicago will be a forty million dollar Exposition, and it will be the final result of as great advantage to this cluster of sea-board cities as it will be to Chicago. As to the size and grandeur of that Exposition have you a clear idea? Its buildings will cover six hundred acres of ground. The great nations of Europe have their agents this moment in America struggling for whole acres of space in which to set forth their fabrics. Chicago is not an inland city as some have described it. It is on the shore of an ocean, a great expanse of water miscalled a lake, and in its majestic roll Lake Michigan will give all the advantage that any city can get from a water-front. The Exposition will be a city of itself. "The Manufacturers and Liberal Arts Building" will cover thirty-two acres, its roof of iron and glass hovering one hundred and fifty feet above ground, and its columns suggesting Parthenons American instead of Grecian. "The Government Building" with its octagonal dome one hundred and twenty feet in diameter, and with its walls encompassing a national museum, demonstrating what our Government has done in war and peace; and a life-saving station showing how the ship-wrecked are saved from the deep: a building surrounded by lawns and promenades dipping to the sea. "The Casino and Pier," with nine pavilions, amid which you pass on fairy bridge or Venetian gondola: the waters in front by night having lamps sunken beneath the surface so that it will be "a sea of glass mingled with fire." "The Machinery Hall" to contain the triumphs of inventive genius all round the world, a million dollars to be expended in its construction, the ceiling glorified with all pulchre of color, and the building crowned with urets and exquisite with statues, a great palace to display the results of the brawn and brain of the nineteenth century. "The Electrical Building," where will be shown as never before, what can be done with fire, electric lights masked behind triumphal arches. "The Transportation Building" in which the whole railroad world will be dramatized. "The Horticultural Building," a half heaven full of flowers. "The Woman's Building," where Eve, whose pomological fondness turned the race out of Paradise will turn them in again. "The Fisheries Building" that will demonstrate that the chief resource of the world's food has hardly yet been drawn upon. "The Art Palace," which shall be a Louvre, a Luxembourg, a Vatican, a Dresden, combined in one great bloom of pictures and in one Alpine snow-drift of statues. "The Administration Building," "The Naval Exhibit," "The Hall of Mines and Mining," "The Agricultural Building," majestic, and educational, and radiant, and the pride of America, and the world. All nations will be there. Germany has voted or will vote $250,000 toward it, and France $400,000, and Brazil $445,000, and Mexico $750,000, and all the other nations transatlantic and cisatlantic have voted or will vote corresponding help, and careful statisticians have figured up the aforesaid forty million dollars for this enterprise of the hemispheres.

The advantage to Chicago cannot be exaggerated, nor can the advantage to this cluster of sea-coast cities be exaggerated. Through our harbor will come the most of the foreign fabrics and products. The foreign people who come will for the most part be men of means and their patronage of these cities as they pass through twice will be valuable beyond estimate. They will stay here a month. We shall feel none of the reactions which are oft to be felt in a city where a great Fair is done. We congratulate Chicago on her securing the Fair. We congratulate our sea-board cities just as much on the advantages they will surely gain. And then we are to have the great display of shipping in our harbor, the first act in that great Drama of Celebration, and as the West will come here to see our Exhibition, the East will go West to see theirs. Now let us wake up to our national opportunity and instead of spending so much time in deploring the seeming disaster of not having the World's Fair here, rejoice that so many advantages will surely be ours with none of the disadvantages. From this time on let our lukewarmness give way to one great national huzzza for the World's Columbian Exposition.

STONING THE MISSIONARIES.

A VISIT to Joazeirs in Brazil is reported by Rev. W. E. Finley, the Presbyterian missionary at Bahia. The trip was made on mules as the town is nearly ninety miles beyond Villa Nova. The Gospel had never before been preached there, though two colporteurs had visited the place some years ago and sold Bibles there. On his arrival, Mr. Finley sought a place to preach in and was courteously offered the Theatre free of charge. As he had been warned, however, the Roman Catholic priest was violently opposed to the service. He denounced the preacher publicly from the pulpit and cautioned the people against attending. He even went so far as to hint to some of the rougher spirits that there would be no sin in stoning the preacher.

"Sunday was the day appointed for the services," says Mr. Finley, "and was also a feast day in the church. Early in the morning a brass band awakened us. It was parading the streets telling the people that the 'Festival of the Holy Spirit' was to be celebrated. At ten o'clock I held the first service, about one hundred persons were present. We sang the Gospel songs—offered prayer and I preached. After services we went to our house and conversed with many about the Bible. In the afternoon boys began to stone our house.

"At six o'clock in the evening the procession started out to parade the streets, the vicar accompanying them. We had closed the windows and doors in front knowing that they would do something. When the procession reached the front of the house a deluge of stones fell in front, but did little damage. When the procession had passed we went out, it being almost time for evening services. I went to the theatre and waited for the hour. Meanwhile the procession passed again and the house was stoned more than ever. I preached that evening to an audience of five hundred people—all listened very attentively. After the meeting, the chief of police came up to the pulpit and offered his protection and escort to the house. I went out surrounded

CHASTENED.

TEACH me, O my gracious Master, Patience and submission sweet: Let my chaste'n'd spirit cast her Burdens at thy sacred feet. Lift the storm-cloud that has bent me In the dust to agonize; Teach me that these trials sent me May be blessings in disguise, Bring my roving heart still nearer To thy loving, tender side, Till the thought of heav'n grows dearer, And the Cross is sanctified. Storms that here so rudely buffet, Drift us nearer to the port; Through each pang and sorrow suffer'd Richer lessons we are taught. Whereby faith may get a surer Hold upon eternal things, Till this life grows sweeter, purer,— Finds in God its secret springs, Neath His chaste'ning hand thus growing To the other world akin, Faith may reach the sphere of knowing, In Christ's school of discipline.

New Brunswick, N. J.

Success always lies up stream, and it requires will and muscle to get there. Many almost succeed, reach for the prize they would hang on to, and find they have no strength left to hang on with. They have enough grit, but not enough grip. To such men and women Drs. Starkey & Palen's COMPOUND OXYGEN supplies the needed power. Like sand under the locomotive wheel, it makes effort effectual. Success is too dear at the price of starved lungs, worn out nerves, impaired digestion. It's good to gain a prize. It's better still to be able to enjoy it.

COMPOUND OXYGEN has back of it the accumulated success of twenty-two years. The theory is that the air on which we live, when enriched and magnetized, will make the system stronger. It's as capable of proof as is the multiplication table. Send for our book of particulars. Do so to-day. It costs only the asking.

ON MOUNT MORIAH.

The Ancient Site of Solomon's Temple now Occupied by two Famous Mosques — El-Aksa and its History—Strange Moslem Traditions Connected with the Sacred Place.

AMONG the architectural marvels of the Orient, there are few that excel in simple beauty of design or in grand and imposing effect, some of the Mosques to be found in Palestine. In approaching Jerusalem, the traveler's eye is caught by an edifice which rises so high that it can be discerned at a considerable distance. It is the Mosque of Omar which stands within the sacred enclosure known as the "Haram es-schereef" or the Noble Sanctuary, where once stood the Temple of Solomon and which is now occupied by several mosques, some of them of great beauty and rare architectural skill. The Haram, which occupies about one-fourth of the entire space enclosed within the walls of the city, is on Mount Moriah and on the top of the famous hill is the Mosque of Omar.

At the south end of the enclosure is the Mosque El-Aksa, originally a basilica or church, built by the Emperor Justinian in the sixth century in honor of the Virgin, and afterward converted in to a mosque when the Saracens became masters of the Holy Land. It is a long structure, supported by many beautiful pillars while a noble facade of arches, surmounted by a range of pinnacles declares its Gothic type and shows the main part of the present building to have been in all probability the work of the Crusaders. Within are seven aisles all bearing different dates, and pillars of enormous thickness divide the nave from the side aisles, while a dome rises over the centre of the transept. The building is 270 feet long and 190 feet wide and within its strong walls once dwelt the Knights-Templar who fought for the redemption of Palestine from the Paynims, during the period when the struggle for the Holy City was the fiercest. In and around this ancient mosque, the battle often raged between the Christian warriors and the Moslems with desperate energy, and traditions assert, and the Rev. Dr. Geikie in his celebrated work on The Holy Land and

The Bible declares, that the greater part of the ten thousand infidels who perished by the swords of the Christians fell in and around those courts and corridors.

Outside the main entrance, there is a flight of steps leading down to a remarkable series of arched dome-shaped vaults, supported by great piers and pillars. The vastness of these substructures at once strikes the observer with amazement. When the platform on Mount Moriah was first prepared for the Temple of Solomon, it was necessary to raise, in those parts of the hill that sloped down abruptly, stanch substructures for the purpose of securing a wide and level area. This was done not by filling up the sloping parts of the hill with earth or rubble, but by the erection of arched vaults, sufficiently strong to defy the ravages of time. On a part of this arched platform, representing prodigious labor and expense, the Mosque of Aksa stands. A por-mind they far out-rank in interest, the other attractions of El-Aksa, whose cloisters, colonnades porticoes and cypresses are said to have been brought from Stamboul to redeem a boast of Saladin that "a greater than Solomon has been here."

It was concerning these vast substructures that Flavius Josephus, the historian of the Jews, wrote: "And when they (the people) had built walls on three sides of the temple round about, and from the bottom of the hill, and had performed a work that was greater than could be hoped for, (in which work long ages were spent by them, as well as all their sacred treasures were exhausted, which were still replenished by those tributes which were sent to God from the whole habitable earth), they then encompassed their upper courts with cloisters as well as they afterwards did the lowest courts of the temple."

Until a recent date, Christians were not per-the site of the glorious Temple; among Christians it is deemed holy by reason of its connection with the life of the Saviour on earth, and Mohammedans worship it as second only to the Kaaba at Mecca. They declare that Mohammed on one occasion came to Mount Moriah and there commanded that all the faithful, when praying, should turn their faces toward Jerusalem. This belief has caused them to refuse permission to Jews and Christians to visit the temple grounds.

Some travelers have made a study of the various Moslem traditions connected with the Haram. These traditions mingle with and at times seems to confuse the genuine history of the sacred spot. The guides point out to the traveler where the sons of Aaron are buried; where Moses prayed; the imprint of the Saviour's foot, and the place where the Caliph Omar prayed after entering Jerusalem. The latter is a very narrow space between two pillars of El-Aksa, standing quite closely together and palpably worn and indented by the many pilgrims who have attempted to thrust themselves through the eight-inch opening. There is a Moslem superstition that if a man can pass between these pillars, his sins are forgiven him. As almost every pilgrim tries it, the disappointments are many.

Between the Mosque El-Aksa and the Mosque of Omar is a marble fountain known as El-Kas or "The Cup," under which are the great cisterns for storing the water conveyed from Solomon's Pools. These the Arabs still call The Cisterns of the Sea, the tradition being that the "Molten Sea," was located here.

The Mosque of Omar, which is on the highest part of the hill, has been called by the Moslems the Kubbet-es-Sukrah, or Dome of the Rock, from the fact that it contains, according to tradition, the sacred rock upon which Abraham was prepared to offer up Isaac.

Ages afterward, this rock became the property of Araunah the Jebusite, who made use of it as a threshing-floor, and from him King David purchased it for an altar. This rock, the tradition further affirms, became the altar of burnt-offering in Solomon's Temple, and was ultimately the place chosen for the Saviour's Sepulchre. Mohammedan claims even go further, and affirm that the rock itself was brought from heaven and that a river from Paradise flows beneath it and waters the palm on which it rests.

THE MOSQUE EL-AKSA, ON PART OF THE SITE OF SOLOMON'S TEMPLE.

(From a photograph secured in Jerusalem by Dr. Talmage.)

tion of the vaults has received the name of "Solomon's Stables," where, as the Bible relates, the king had "forty thousand stalls of horses for his chariots." The rings in the stones used for hitching the horses are still visible. While these vaults are not comparable in point of antiquity with many Egyptian buildings, they possess a higher interest as forming the foundations of the first great temple ever erected on the earth to the service of God. To a thoughtful Christian mitted to visit the Haram, to see the site of the Temple, now occupied by the mosques of Omar and El-Aksa. Even now it is usually demanded of the visitor that he should have either a Moslem policeman or an officer from the Consulate of his country to accompany him. The Haram is probably the most interesting spot in the world and has been held sacred through many centuries by the followers of three religions—Jews, Moslems and Christians alike. Among Hebrews it is revered as

OUR ROYAL BLOOD.

Dr. Talmage's latest Sunday morning sermon: "Each one resembled the children of a king." Judges 8: 18.

ZEBAH and Zalmunna had been off to battle, and when they came back they were asked what kind of people they had seen. They answered, that the people had a royal appearance; "each one resembled the children of a king." I stand to-day before many who have this appearance. Indeed, they are the sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty. Though now in exile, they shall yet come to their thrones. There are family names that stand for wealth, or patriotism, or intelligence. The name of Washington means patriotism, although some of the blood of that race has become very thin in the last generation. The family of the Medici stood as the representative of letters. The family of the Rothschilds is significant of wealth, the loss of forty millions of dollars in 1848 putting them to no inconvenience; and within a few years they have loaned Russia twelve millions of dollars, Naples twenty-five millions, Austria forty millions, and England two hundred millions; and the stroke of their pen on the counting-room desk shakes everything from the Irish Sea to the Danube. They open their hand, and there is war; they shut it, and there is peace. The House of Hapsburg in Austria, the House of Stuart in England, the House of Bourbon in France, were families of imperial authority.

But I come to preach of a family more potential, more rich, and more extensive—the Royal House of Jesus, of whom the whole family in heaven and on earth is named. We are blood relations by the relationship of the Cross; all of us are the children of the King.

First, I speak of our family name. When we see a descendant of some one greatly celebrated in the last century, we look at him with profound interest. To have had conquerors, kings, or princes in the ancestral line give lustre to the family name. In our line was a King and a Conqueror. The Star in the East with baton of light woke up the eternal orchestra that made music at his birth. From thence he started forth to conquer all nations, not by trampling them down, but by lifting them up. St. John saw him on a white horse. When he returns, he will not bring the nations chained to his wheel, or in iron cages; but I fear the stroke of the hoofs of the snow-white cavalcade that bring them to the gates in triumph.

Our family name takes lustre from the star that heralded him, and the spear that pierced him, and the crown that was given him. It gathers fragrance from the frankincense brought to his cradle, and the lilies that flung their sweetness into his sermons, and the box of alabaster that broke at his feet. The Comforter at Bethany. The Resurrector at Nain. The supernatural Oculist at Bethsaida. The Saviour of one world, and the Chief Joy of another. The storm his frown. The sunlight his smile. The spring morning his breath. The earthquake the stamp of his foot. The thunder the whisper of his voice. The ocean a drop on the tip of his finger. Heaven a sparkle on the bosom of his love. Eternity the twinkling of his eye. The universe the flying dust of his chariot-wheels. Able to heal a heart-break, or hush a tempest, or drown a world, or flood immensity with his glory. What other family name could ever boast of such an illustrious personage?

Henceforth, swing out the coat of arms! Great families wear their coat of arms on the dress, or on the door of the coach, or on the helmet when they go out to battle, or on flags and ensigns. The heraldic sign is sometimes a lion, or a dragon, or an eagle. Our coat of arms worn right over the heart, hereafter shall be a Cross, a Lamb standing under it, and a Dove flying over it. Grandest of all escutcheons! Most significant of all family "coats of arms." In every battle

THE RESURRECTOR.

I must have it blazing on my flag—the Dove, the Cross, the Lamb; and when I fall, wrap me in that good old Christian flag, so that the family coat of arms shall be right over my breast, that all the world may see that I looked to the Dove of the Spirit, and clung to the Cross, and depended upon the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world.

Ashamed of Jesus!—that dear Friend,
On whom my hopes of life depend:
No! when I blush be this my shame—
That I no more revere his name.

Next, I speak of the family sorrows. If trouble come to one member of the family, all feel it. It is the custom, after the body is lowered into the grave, for all the relatives to come to the verge of the grave and look down into it. First those nearest the departed come, then those next of kin, until they have all looked into the grave. So, when trouble and grief go down through the heart of one member of the family, they go down through them all. The sadness of one is the sadness of all. A company of persons join hands around an electric battery; the two persons at the ends of the line touch the battery, and all the circle feels the shock. Thus, by reason of the filial, maternal, and paternal relations of life, we stand so close together that when trouble sets its battery, all feel the thrill of distress. In the great Christian family, the sorrow of one ought to be the sorrow of all. Is one persecuted? All are persecuted. Does one suffer loss? We all suffer loss. Is one bereaved? We are all bereaved.

Their streaming eyes together flow
For human guilt and mortal woe.

If you rejoice at another's misfortune, you are not one of the sheep, but one of the goats; and the vulture of sin hath alighted on your soul, and not the Dove of the Spirit.

Next, I notice the family property. After a man of large estate dies, the relatives assemble to hear the will read. So much of the property is willed to his sons, and so much to his daughters, and so much to benevolent societies. Our Lord Jesus hath died, and we are assembled to-day to hear the will read. He says: "My peace I give unto you." Through his apostle he says: "All are yours." What! everything? Yes, everything! This world and the next. In distinguished families there are old pictures hanging on the wall. They are called the "heir-looms" of the estate. They are very old; and have come down from generation to generation. So I look upon all the beauties of the natural world as the heir-looms of our royal family. The morning breaks from the east. The mists travel up hill above hill, mountain above mountain, until sky-lost. The forests are full of chirp, and buzz, and song. Tree's leaf and bird's wing flutter with gladness. Honey-makers in the log, and beak against the bark, and squirrels chattering on the rail, and the call of the hawk out of a clear sky, make you feel glad. The sun, which kindles conflagrations among the castles of cloud, and sets minaret and dome aflame stoops to paint the lily white, and the butter-cup yellow, and the forget-me-not blue. What can resist the sun? Light for the voyager over the deep! Light for the shepherd guarding the flocks afield! Light for the poor who have no lamps to burn! Light for the downcast and the lowly! Light for aching eyes, and burning brain and wasted captive! Light for the smooth brow of childhood, and for the dim vision of the octogenarian! Light for queen's coronet, and for sewing-girl's needle! Let there be light! Whose morning is this? My morning. Your morning. Our Father gave us the picture and hung it on the sky in loops of fire. It is the heir-loom of our family. And so the night. It is the full moon. The mists from shore to shore gleam like shattered mirrors; and the ocean, under her glance, comes up with great tides, panting upon the beach, mingling as it were, foam and fire. The poor man blesses God for throwing such a cheap light through the broken window-pane into his cabin; and to the sick it seems a light from the other shore which bounds this great deep of human pain and woe. If the sun seem like a song full and poured from brazen instruments that fill heaven and earth with great harmonies, the moon is plaintive and mild, standing beneath the throne of God, sending up her soft, sweet voice of praise, while the stars listen, and the sea. No mother ever more sweetly guarded the sick-cradle than all night long this pale watcher of the sky bends over the weary, heart-sick, slumbering earth. Whose is this black-framed, black-tasseled picture of the night? It is the heir-loom of our family. Ours, the grandeur of the spring, the crystals of the snow, the coral of the beach, the odors of the garden, the harmonies of the air.

You cannot see a large estate in one morning. You must take several walks around it. The family property of this royal house of Jesus is so great that we must take several walks to get any idea of its extent. Let the first walk be around this earth. All these valleys, the harvests that wave in them, and the cattle that pasture them—all these mountains, and the precious things hidden beneath them, and the crown of glacier they cast at the feet of the Alpine hurricane—all these lakes, these islands, these continents, are ours. In the second walk, go among the street-lamps of heaven, and see stretching off on every side a wilderness of worlds. For us they shine. For us they sang at a Saviour's nativity. For us they will wheel into line, and with their flaming torches add to the splendor of our triumph on the day for which all other days were made. In the third walk, go around the Eternal City. As we come near it, hark to the rush of its chariots, and the wedding-peal of its great towers. The bell of heaven has struck twelve. It is high noon. We look off upon the chaplets which never fade, the eyes that never weep, the temples that never close, the loved ones that never part, the procession that never halts, the trees that never wither, the walls that never can be captured, the sun that never sets, until we can no longer gaze, and we hide our eyes, and exclaim: "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him!" As these tides of glory rise, we have to retreat, and hold fast lest we be swept off and drowned in the emotions of gladness, and thanksgiving, and triumph.

What think you of the family property? It is considered an honor to marry into a family where there is great wealth. The Lord, the bridegroom of earth and heaven, offers you his heart and his hand, saying, in the words of the Canticles: "Rise up, my love, my fair one, and come away;" and once having put on thy hand the signet-ring of his love, you will be endowed with all the wealth of earth, and all the honors of heaven.

Almost every family looks back to a homestead—some country-place where you grew up. You sat on the door-sill. You heard the footstep of the rain on the garret-roof. You swung on the gate. You ransacked the barn. You waded into the brook. You threshed the orchard for apples, and the neighboring woods for nuts; and everything around the old homestead is of interest to you. I tell you of the old homestead of eternity. In my Father's house are many mansions. When we talk of mansions, we think of Chatsworth, and its park, nine miles in circumference, and its conservatory, that astonishes the world; its galleries of art, that contain the triumphs of Chantrey, Canova, and Thorwaldsen; of the kings and the queens who have walked its stately halls, or, flying over the heather, have hunted the grouse. But all the dwelling-places of dukes, and princes, and queens, are as nothing to the family mansion that is already awaiting our arrival. The hand of the Lord Jesus lifted the pillars, and swung the doors, and planted the parks. Angels walk there, and the good of all ages. The poorest man in that house is a millionaire, and the lowliest a king, and the tamest word he speaks is an anthem, and the shortest life an eternity.

It took a Paxton to build for Chatsworth a covering for the wonderful flower, Victoria Regia, five feet in diameter. But our Lily of the Valley shall need no shelter from the blast, and in the open gardens of God shall put forth its full bloom, and all heaven shall come to look at it, and its aroma shall be as though the cherubim had swung before the throne a thousand censers. I have not seen it yet. I am in a foreign land. But my Father is waiting for me to come home. I have brothers and sisters there. In the Bible I have letters from there, telling me what a fine place it is. It matters not much to me whether I am rich or poor, or whether the world hates me or loves me, or whether I go by land or by sea, if only I may lift my eyes at last on the family mansion. It is not a frail house, built in a month, soon to crumble, but an old mansion which is as firm as the day it was built. Its walls are grown with the ivy of many ages, and the urns at the gate-way are a-bloom with the century-plants of eternity. The Queen of Sheba hath walked its halls, and Esther, and Marie Antoinette, and Lady Huntingdon, and Cecil, and Jeremy Taylor, and Samuel Rutherford, and John Milton, and the widow who gave two mites, and the poor men from the hospital—these last two perhaps outshining all the kings and queens of eternity.

A family mansion means reunion. Some of your families are very much scattered. The children married, and and went off to St. Louis, or Chicago, or Charleston; but perhaps once a year you come together at the old place. How you wake up the old piano that has been silent for years! (Father and mother do not play on it.) How you bring out the old relics, and rummage the garret, and open old scrap-books, and shout, and laugh, and cry, and talk over old times, and, though you may be forty-five years of age, act as though you were sixteen! Yet soon it is good-bye at the car-window, and good-bye at the steamboat wharf. But how will we act at the reunion in the old family mansion of heaven? It is a good while since you parted at the door of the grave. There will be Grace, and Mary, and Martha, and Charlie, and Lizzie, and all the darlings of your household—not pale, and sick, and gasping for breath, as when you saw them last, but their eye bright with the lustre of heaven, and their cheek roseate with the flush of celestial summer.

What clasping of hands! What embraces! What coming together of lip to lip! What tears of joy! You say: "I thought there were no tears in heaven." There must be, for the Bible says that: "God shall wipe them away;" and if there were no tears there, how could he wipe them away? They cannot be tears of grief or tears of disappointment. They must be tears of gladness. Christ will come and say: "What! child of heaven, is it too much for thee? Dost thou break down under the gladness of this reunion? Then I will help thee." And, with his one arm around us and the other arm around our loved one, he shall hold us up in the eternal jubilee.

While I speak some of you, with broken hearts, can hardly hold your peace. You feel as if you would speak out and say: "O blessed day! speed on. Toward thee I press with blistered feet over the desert way. My eyes fail for their weeping. I faint from listening for feet that will not come, and the sound of voices that will not speak. Speed on, O day of reunion! And then, Lord Jesus, be not angry with me if after I have just once kissed thy blessed feet, I turn around to gather up the long-lost treasures of my heart. Oh! be not angry with me. One look at thee were heaven. But all these reunions are heaven encircling heaven, heaven overtopping heaven, heaven commingling with heaven!"

I was at Mount Vernon, and went into the dining-room in which our first President entertained the prominent men of this and other lands. It was a very interesting spot. But oh! the banquet-hall of the family mansion of which I speak! Spread the table, spread it wide; for a great multitude are to sit at it. From the Tree by the River gather the twelve manner of fruits for that table. Take the clusters from the heavenly vineyards, and press them into the golden tankards for that table. On baskets carry in the Bread of which, if man eat, he shall never hunger. Take all the shot-torn flags of earthly conquest, and entwine them among the arches. Let David come with his harp, and Gabriel with his trumpet, and Miriam with the timbrel; for the prodigals are at home, and the captives are free, and the Father hath invited the mighty of heaven and the redeemed of earth to come and dine!

A WIDOW'S GIFT.

A CONTRIBUTION of a widow in Scotland to the cause of foreign missions had remarkable results recently. She was a poor woman, but out of her income she used to set aside a portion to send the gospel to the heathen. Frequently, it was necessary for her to economize in food in order to make her regular gift. For a week or two lately she lived on porridge, exclusively, that she might save the usual sum. "Get yourself a bit of meat," said a friend, who happened to see the old woman dining on her porridge, and the friend handed her a coin worth about ten cents. The widow took the money but on her way to the market it occurred to her that she had done very well with porridge and did not feel the need of meat, so she added the dime to her missionary gift. The Secretary of the Missionary Society heard of what the widow did and told the story at a missionary breakfast where the host and several of the guests were wealthy men and liberal givers. "How many of us," he asked, "have the spirit of giving that will match that? She can say as David did, she does not offer to God that which costs her nothing. How many of us can say that we have denied ourselves that we may give?" The men around the table listened, and presently one said: "I could give $2,500, but I should have to pinch for it. I'll do it," and he wrote a cheque for the amount. Others did the same, and when the secretary left he had cheques in his pocket of the value of eleven thousand dollars as the fruit of that widow's self-denial.

THE CHINESE RIOTS.

A Thrilling Description of the Disturbances at Ichang, related by an Eyewitness.

THE North China Daily News, in a recent issue, published a letter from a correspondent at Ichang, North China, containing the most detailed and circumstantial account of the disturbances there that has yet appeared in any newspaper. To the friends of Foreign Missions it has a special interest, and to-day we devote space to the more important parts of the correspondence.

On Wednesday, September 2nd, writes the eyewitness, it came like a thunderbolt from a clear sky, taking the most wary by surprise, and the programme was carried out with a thoroughness and dispatch which are altogether unprecedented. There was no indication of danger until the signal of attack was given, and in twenty minutes all was over. On Tuesday, September 1st, a child was brought to the Roman Catholic Convent, and the ordinary papers were duly signed making it over to the Sisters. The child was represented to be a girl (only girls were received at the Convent), and when it was discovered to be a boy, the circumstance caused some uneasiness. On Wednesday morning parties appeared at the Convent declaring their child had been stolen, and saying it was within. In due course the child was produced and delivered to the claimants. Meanwhile a crowd had collected, but nothing serious was suspected, although, as was proper under the circumstances, information was sent to the magistrate. But the ring-leaders had also gone clamoring to the yamen, collecting the dogs of the city as they went along. Instead of shutting the yamen doors the magistrate with his runners and bodyguard proceeded to the Convent, taking the crowd along with him. The military commandant of the rank of Chentai was also on the scene with a large number of soldiers, and some show was made of protecting the Convent.

All at once a rush was made for the house in the adjoining compound belonging to the American Episcopal Mission. The gate was smashed in; two trumpets were blown, and a man beating his breast, shouted out, "Come on brothers, slay the foreigners; I am willing to die for you." The riot had commenced, but so little sign was there of anything stirring going to happen, that the coolies whom the Rev. Mr. Sowerby had carrying earth in the compound never left off their work or went to see what was doing next door. In came the rioters with a rush; one of the foremost men snatching a spade from a coolie and aiming a murderous blow at Mr. Sowerby, who managed to disarm this assailant. The coolies shouted at him to run for his life. By jumping a fence and running Mr. Sowerby was just able to reach the Consulate in an exhausted condition. From the Consulate he was able to get on board the Paohua with no further adventure.

To set fire to the American Mission house was the work of an instant, and as soon as the signal of destruction was given, yamen runners and soldiers fell back, nor did either military or civil mandarins give a single order to protect life or property. It is particularly to be noted that against Mr. Sowerby, whose house was the first burned, there was not even the semblance of a grudge. In less time than it takes to write it, the torch was applied to the convents the sisters, seven in number and of various nationalities (French, German and British,) escaping as best they could down a lane to the river, escorted by Father Braun, a very powerful man, and formerly an officer in the German army. To give them their due, officials and soldiers also escorted the sisters.

The mandarins seemed to receive some rough usage. As soon as the steep bank of the river was reached, the sisters were thrown headlong over it by the very soldiers who had aided in their protection so far, an incident fortunately noticed on board the Paohua which was anchored opposite, and Captain Lewis instantly launched a boat, which proceeded to the rescue and found the sisters and Father Braun exposed to the full fury of a shower of missiles, in a sampan without oars into which they had scrambled. The ship's boat took the sampan in tow, and the whole party were soon in safety on board the Paohua which had steam up to run down any boatloads of rioters who might attempt to board, and was defended by the repeating rifles of Captain Lewis, Mr. Moore, and Mr.

Grouleff. Right down to the river bank the orphans in the Convent had clung to the sisters, but they were violently seized by the soldiers and were kept back. It was now suspected that a number of children must have been burned in the Convent.

Down the lane at the end of the English Consulate and along the streets in front of it, the rioters swept with the violence of a tropical storm, but not a finger was lifted against the Consulate. The house, owned by a native—mandarin's secretary—in which the Rev. Mr. Deans and Dr. Pirie of the Church of Scotland Mission lived, Captain Cain's house (empty); the mat shed in front of Messrs. Jardine, Matheson & Co.'s godown, Dr. Creagh's house inhabited by Dr. Aldridge, of the Customs, and the Franciscans Mission, were fired simultaneously. The pick-axes made short work of the doors, and no time was wasted by the slightest attempt to loot. Mr. Cockburn was in a boat on the river within 50 yards of the scene and saw the whole thing done.

A mandarin was in Mr. Cockburn's compound vociferating: "Do not burn Mr. Cockburn's house; you all know him, he has been here over ten years and does works of charity (hao-sz); take any thing you want, but do not burn his house." The American Episcopal Mission and a native house within the city, and the Church of Scotland Mission Station outside the north gate, are safe. No protection was given, but everything was as quiet as on ordinary occasions. If Christianity be offensive to the Chinese and Mission work felt to be a grievance, it is passing strange that the very centres of proselytising should not have a single stone cast at them. What happened at Ichang should convince all parties that it is not this or that individual class of Europeans that is aimed at, but at Europeans without distinction of nationality or occupation.

Mrs. Roberts and daughter, of Shanghai, visitors to Ichang; Mr. and Mrs. Cockburn and five children, Dr. Pirie, Mr. Deans and Mr. McNair, of the C. I. M., from Shasi, all reached the steamer Paohua in safety.

Crowds of those caught with burdens of wood charred have been lodged in the yamen, but the mandarins durst not lay a finger on any of the real criminals. They are no doubt prepared to inflict any punishment demanded by the foreign powers on the miserable creatures they have arrested, the very utmost limit of whose offences does not exceed petty theft. More than all this there was an open attempt to commence the riot ten days before it actually occurred. At that date three Chinese entered the Scotch Mission by the back door, loudly demanding to be shown the place where the foreigners picked out children's eyes.

Making their way to the church in which a native helper was preaching, they commenced tossing the seats about and shouting abuse which need not be repeated. Then seeing the various proclamations which have been issued in reference to the riots on the lower river posted up in front of the Church, one of them went up to them and shouted out: "These, too, are fabrications of the foreigners. Not one of them is genuine nor bears the proper seals. I am an official myself and know the seals to be forgeries; see, here is a proper seal," pulling something from his pocket. By this time a crowd had collected, contrary to expectation the people of the neighborhood, among them a military graduate, stoutly interfered, saying they all knew what was done in the Mission, and they would permit no disturbance to be raised by such slanderous statements. Then taking him by the shoulders they forcibly ejected him and saw him safely to his home. What he said was not all false. He turned out to be a military office, named Wang, of the rank of Waiwei. Through the council, who personally examined the witnesses, the Chentai was informed of what had taken place, and a reply was received that Mr. Wang had got a black mark put against his name, three of them being enough to ruin a man.

The bearing Ichang has on the rest of China cannot be appreciated without knowing that the Chentai is an official of exceptional honesty and energy, who has heretofore been regarded with good reason as very friendly to Europeans. For China his soldiers are in an excellent state of discipline. But he is a Hunan man, and his soldiers are from Hunan. Hunan people in the employment of officials are at the bottom of everything. Sufferers in the riot simply escaped in the clothes they stood in. They saved absolutely nothing, and the houses fired were burned to the ground. Fortunately there has been no loss of life, but infuriated men brandishing knives mean murder, and had the Paohua not been in port there would have been a sadder tale to tell.

THE RISEN CHRIST.

S. S. Lesson for Dec. 20. By Mrs. M. Baxter.
John 21 : 1-14. Golden Text, Col. 3 : 1.

THE risen Jesus, "having made peace through the blood of his Cross," met his disciples with an authoritative message of peace. On the resurrection evening, when the disciples were assembled together with closed doors for fear of the Jews, Jesus, who has the key of every door in earth and heaven, stood in their midst, and said, "Peace be unto you." And, as a seal to his message, "He showed unto them his hands and his side, the eternal witness that the chastisement of our peace was upon him," and that "with his stripes we are healed." And he reiterated this word as the guarantee from him for their commission: "Peace be unto you; as my Father hath sent me, even so send I you." And breathing out his eternal life upon them, he said: "Receive ye the Holy Ghost, Divine peace and Divine power."

One of the eleven was wanting. In moments of crisis, it is well when the Lord's "little flock" keep together, there is of Christ, and their "gathering together unto him," of which many Christians have no conception. It was when all were gathered together into one place, that the Holy Ghost was poured out (Acts 2: 1-4); it was when many were gathered together praying, in the house of Mary, the mother of Mark, at Jerusalem, that Peter was delivered from prison by the angel. (Acts 12.) But Jesus knew when Thomas, who, not having been present with the disciples on the resurrection evening, should be found again in the company of the disciples. And although Thomas had lost a full week in unbelief, and had come behind the ten remaining disciples in his apprehension of Divine things, through his absence from the company when Jesus manifested himself, yet the Master appeared with the same salutation: "Peace be unto you," and conquered the unbelieving disciple by calling him to touch those very wounds which were still fresh from the Cross.

When Thomas was conquered, Jesus could go, as he had foretold, into Galilee. (Matt. 28: 7, 16.) There, six of his disciples met him, and Thomas was one of them; the strife who should be the greatest which occupied them even to a few hours before Jesus suffered (Luke 22: 21), seems to have ceased; the prayer of Jesus (John 17: 20), "that they all may be one," was beginning to be fulfilled. And yet it was the definite direction for which they were to wait for the Holy Ghost after Christ's ascension, was comparatively easy. But now all was indefinite; their hopes and expectations had been crushed, their expected king had been crucified, they were ready to think they had been cruelly deceived in thinking him to be the Christ when he manifested himself as risen from the dead. And yet he did not proclaim himself to the world, there was nothing even in his resurrection which could make them other in the eyes of men than despised followers of a condemned and executed criminal. Had they left all and followed him for this? Simon Peter's energy could not stand the strain, he must do something; and he said: "I go a fishing." What; could he not be true to his vocation for which he had left his ship and his former surroundings? The example was followed: "We also go with thee." But "that night they caught nothing." Jesus was not with them; he had taught them: "Without me ye can do nothing." (John 15: 5.) But they had not counted an ordinary occupation to which they were accustomed as included in this powerlessness without Jesus. But they were to learn how absolutely dependent they were to be, and how jealous the Lord is to have his part in every detail of a disciple's life. Morning dawned, and he whom they had come to meet stood on the shore. He had not appointed the lake as the place of meeting, and they, occupied with their want of success, had no eyes to recognize in him their expected Lord. "Children," he said, "have ye any meat?" They answered "No." "Cast the net on the right side of the ship, and ye shall find." The voice betrayed him, and he who had lain on Jesus' breast, said: "It is the Lord."

The energetic, impatient Peter "girt his fishers' coat about him," and "cast himself into the sea," trusting his swimming powers and self-energy to bring him more quickly to his Lord than the boat in which the little company of the disciples rowed, dragging after them the net full of fishes. But Peter's energy to go fishing, Peter's self-girding, Peter's efforts to be first, neither helped him nor anyone else. In the light of Christ's death and resurrection

Human Efforts count for Nothing.

It was only when he lent a hand to the other disciples in landing the fish that Peter was of any real service. We serve God and we serve man far more truly in our vocation as members of his body than in any independent service. But the Master had been before them, and had provision ready, fire already kindled, fish already prepared, bread already baked. "Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine enemies." (Ps. 23: 5.) He always has a supply for the needs of his true followers. It was like old times, and yet there was a new element; the old habit of talking out all that was in their hearts was checked; something in the presence of the risen Christ awed them; "none of the disciples durst ask him, Who art thou? knowing it was the Lord." It was "touch me not," conveyed by his presence, if not in word.

Before Jesus could ascend into heaven, there was in his little company of disciples; one of them had denied him with oaths and curses. It is true that Peter's bitter weeping was a confession of his guilt; it is true that the Lord's look of recognition conveyed his pardon; it is true that when "he shewed unto them his hands and his feet," and said, "Peace be unto you," Peter was not excluded. But Peter must learn to know something of what sin was in the eyes of his Lord and Master. Looking at the ardent disciple, he put to him the question: "Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me more than these?" It was the earthly name, the name of the father whom he had left for Christ's sake, by which Jesus called him. He took him at his word in his denial; Simon, thou man of the flesh, thou son of earth, is that true which thou hast said: "Though all shall be offended because of thee . . . yet will I never be offended? Dost thou love me more than these?"

Something which Needed Regulating

Peter had learned something of his weakness; he could no longer count upon himself, "Yea, Lord," he said, "thou knowest that I love thee." And Jesus gave him as a test of his profession the command, "Feed my lambs." But the test must be put three times, until "Peter was grieved," and said, "Lord, thou knowest all things; thou knowest that I love thee." "Jesus saith unto him, Feed my sheep. Verily, verily, I say unto thee, when thou wast young, thou girdedst thyself, and walkedst whither thou wouldest, but when thou shalt be old, thou shalt stretch forth thy hands, and another shall gird thee, and carry thee where thou wouldest not." Peter had been very wont to gird himself, and go his own way in his own strength of will and purpose; his was a nature which easily took the lead. He was to learn that self-girding was a mark of spiritual childhood. "It is God that girdeth me with strength, and maketh my way perfect." (Ps. 18: 32.) All that strength of effort and devotion which Peter had manifested went for nothing in the true life of God: "What things were gain to me; those I counted loss for Christ." There was too much of Peter, too much of the flesh, in it. Peter must yet learn to walk in the strength of another; to follow and not to lead; to be nothing instead of being a somebody. He should indeed glorify God by following his Master to prison and to death, but not by a devotion and heroism which should signalize him, or make him feel the Lord was indebted to him. It would be by yielding to his persecutors, and becoming, after his Master's example, like the lamb led to the slaughter which openeth not her mouth. "And when, he had spoken this, he saith unto him: Follow Me."

Peter had not yet learned his lesson. Instead of drinking in and beginning to practise the life the Lord called him to lead in following him, Peter turned round to see what John was doing. His jealousy of John and of the other disciples, was indeed departing, but it seemed only natural to him that he should take an interest in John. "Lord, and what shall this man do?" "If I will, that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee? Follow thou me." It is one of Satan's most common distractions to occupy us with our fellow disciples. Peter had a lesson to learn which would take time and all the will which he possessed. It is as though the Lord would say, Leave John to me, and learn thy lesson. All the Lord's dealings with us are directed to separate us to himself, that we may have a life intensely and invariably in oneness with him. How many a young Christian has failed to take a step of faith because he has paused to resolve the question in his heart regarding a Christian brother, "And what shall this man do?" How many of us have waited again and again for the example or advice of others to justify us in a course which God had already revealed to us as the right one. "Ye are bought with a price; be not ye the servants of men." (1. Cor. 7: 23.)

LESSON POINTS.

Especially Adapted to the Requirements of the Desk.

CHILDREN, have ye any meat? Especially at this season of the year when we have occasion to thank God for the bounties he has so abundantly bestowed on us, let us follow the Master's example and frequently inquire of those less favored "children, have ye any meat." Throughout his word, God has promised blessing after blessing upon those who are kind to the poor. The Lord loveth a cheerful giver, and whatsoever we do unto the least of his brethren we do unto him.

When the deacon St. Lawrence was asked in the time of persecution to show the Prefect the most precious treasures of the church, he showed him the sick, the lame, the blind. "It is incredible," said Lucian, the pagan sceptic, "to see the ardor with which these Christians help each other in their wants. They spare nothing. Their first Legislator has put it into their heads that they are all brothers."

When Fox, the author of the "Book of Martyrs" was once leaving the palace of Aylmer, the Bishop of London, a company of poor people begged him with great importunity to relieve their wants. Fox having no money, returned to the Bishop and asked for the loan of five pounds; which was readily granted. He immediately distributed it among the poor by whom he was surrounded. Some months later, Aylmer asked Fox for the money he had borrowed. "I have laid it out for you," was the answer, "and paid it where you owed it—to the poor people who lay at your gate."

Far from being offended, Aylmer thanked Fox for thus being his steward.

They cast therefore. In other words they obeyed immediately and were wonderfully successful. We never can go astray when we obey God. He never sends any one on a fool's errand. These men might have reasoned and said: "What good can be accomplished by doing this? We labored diligently all night and caught nothing. How shall we now succeed by casting the net on the other side." But they did not; they simply obeyed, and with God obedience is life or success, and disobedience death or failure. Turn through your Bible and you will find any quantity of examples to bear this out. God's way is always the best way.

A switchman, whose business it was to attend to the turn-outs near the station, once heard the shriek of an express-train as it came thundering along. He hurried to the switch, when he saw his little boy running toward him on the very track over which the terrible train was coming. He had only a moment for consideration. The train could not be stopped soon enough by the engineer, even if he saw the child. If he rushed to save his child, the whole train would run off the track, and God only knew how many lives might be lost. It was his duty to alter the switch. There was but one thing to be done.

"Lie right down, my son!" he shouted at the top of his voice. He unlocked his bar; he changed the track for the train, and fell to the earth almost unconscious as, with an awful roar, the immense engine with its long train swept by.

What if that little boy had hesitated to obey? What if he had continued to run toward his father? What if he had first asked the question, why he should do so?

But it was not so. Down went the little fellow, at the word of command, flat upon his face. Down upon his face remained the little boy until, the train having passed, the father hurried to him, as rapidly as his fainting limbs would permit, and raised him up unharmed. Obedience was life, disobedience would have been death.

Seek those things which are above. We have a perfect right to seek success here below by all honorable means. But we must not suffer the things of this life to render us unmindful of the life that is to come. No financial or scientific or military or political distinction can entitle us to consideration above. Then why should we set our affections on the dross of this world, and altogether neglect the pure gold of the other? Besides, has not God promised us that if we first seek the Kingdom of God and its righteousness all these things should be added unto it? Is not godliness then profitable unto all things?

On one occasion, while speaking at a Bible Society meeting, over which the Marquis of Anglesea presided, Christmas Evans turned and personally addressed the Marquis, thus:—"I imagine, my Lord, that you have died, and that the angel of death has taken your soul to the portals of the holy city. Only a few are admitted into Paradise; the entrance is narrow and zealously watched. 'Open!' shouts the angel of death, as he presses forward to secure a place in heaven worthy of your Lordship. 'For whom?' asks the guardian of Paradise with an authoritative voice. 'To the Honorable, the Marquis of Anglesea.' 'Who is he?' 'An old officer of the army of the Duke of York.' 'In that capacity' says Peter 'he is not on my list.' 'But he has filled the office of High Master of the Ordnance!' 'That may be possible, but we know him not!' 'He has been several times Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.' 'I say nothing to the contrary, but he is to us a total stranger.' 'He was a leader of the Horse Guards at the battle of Waterloo.' 'I repeat that we know nothing of him.' 'Besides that, he was for many years a true disciple of Christ, and President of the Bible Society.' 'Ho!' shouted Peter, 'that alters the case. He can enter in; indeed I see his name recorded among the blessed on the books of my Father.'

A CHANGED MAN.

A Story of the Sunday School Golden Text for Dec. 20. "If ye then be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above," etc. Col. 3: 1.

CROWDS were filling the streets of a great city. Among them moved a man of noble mien. He was about thirty years of age. Beautiful of face, with a rare perfection of feature, eyes of singular depth and expression, a brow indicating strong intellectual power and a form of manly vigor and grace of movement. As he moved among the crowd, people turned to look at him. Men and women regarded him with looks of admiration, but he passed on heedless of the sensation he was making. At last a woman approached him with a smile of recognition in her face. She was tall and graceful and exceedingly beautiful, but on her countenance was the look of one whose life had been given to pleasure and frivolity. She moved toward him with the manner of one who is sure of receiving a cordial greeting. To her amazement he moved on as one who knew her not. There was no sign of recognition, no evidence in his face of any recollection of her. She started as if wounded by his apparent forgetfulness. Laying her delicate hand gently on his arm, she said in an accent of reproach: "August, it is I." He turned and looked on her with a look of gentleness and pity. He regarded her for a moment sadly but firmly, and then saying: "But it is not I," he turned from her and went on his way. She stood looking after him in amazement. Wounded vanity, vexation, shame, struggled within her; then tears came to her relief. She wept bitterly and, hiding her face, hurried away to some place where she could shed her tears unobserved.

A FIVE THOUSAND DOLLAR RANSOM.

ON Nov. 26th., a bank president in Kansas City, Mo., missed one of his children, a bright, handsome boy two years old. The other children were at play and, when their father inquired for the boy, they told him that he had gone down stairs with the servant. The father went down to look for him, but found that both he and the servant had left the house. As the servant was a stranger, having been with the family only three weeks, the father at once suspected that there was foul play. The police were notified, the railroad stations watched, and a search commenced for the missing child. The night passed, however, without any tidings of him. The next day the father decided to offer a reward for his child. He offered $5,000 and gave an assurance that he would make no attempt to entrap any wrongdoer who might bring back the child. Shortly after the offer was published it was accepted. A man brought the boy back and received the promised $5,000. The child was welcomed with joy unbounded by father, mother, brothers and sisters, and there was no regret for the large sum it had cost to recover him. When the boy grows old enough to understand the affair, he will have no difficulty in realizing how much his father loved him. There ought to be still less difficulty in getting the sinner to realize the love of his heavenly Father who "so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son." (John 3: 16.)

OCEAN DERELICTS.

COMPLAINTS are again made about the number of abandoned ships now drifting on the Atlantic. A shipping journal estimates that the value of these vessels must make an aggregate of at least two million dollars. It also calls attention to the fact that many of the vessels being laden with lumber which keeps them afloat, constitute a greater danger than if they were hopeless and worn-out hulks. There are many wrecks along the Jersey coast, especially in the vicinity of Cape Henlopen and Cape Henry. They are drifting with the currents and Gulf Stream to the northward, and will soon be in the path of the ocean greyhounds. The positions of these derelicts have been accurately determined. Their cargoes are often valuable, that of the schooner Sargent being the best Mexican mahogany. This vessel was seen and boarded by the officers and crew of the schoolship Saratoga on her last voyage across the Atlantic, and would prove a rich catch for any prize crew that could bring her into port. As some of them are floating keel uppermost much effort and time would be needed to bring them in, but it would appear that they are worth the trouble. It is so with the human derelicts drifting in society. They are ruined themselves and a danger to others, but they are well worth rescuing, and a reward is promised to those who succeed in saving them. (James 5: 20.)

A TITLE IN TREES.

PURCHASES of growing harvests are familiar arrangements, as in Delaware, where in the spring the owner of an orchard often sells the peaches almost before they have made their appearance on the trees. But it is unusual, as has recently been done in several districts in Connecticut, to sell the trees themselves, without selling the land on which they are growing. That also is regularly done when the purchaser is going to cut the trees down but in this case the contract expressly forbids their being cut down for a long term of years. The project originated with a New York man, who is an enthusiastic lover of trees. He bought a summer residence in Connecticut, a few years ago, and has driven about the State a good deal during his summer sojourns. He was grieved to see how little store the people set by the noble trees which abounded there. He wished he could become the owner of the land for the sake of protecting the trees from the axe. That being impossible, he conceived the idea of buying the trees. This he has done in large numbers paying in some cases $25 for the title of a single tree. There is therefore in many districts the novel situation of the trees belonging to one man and the ground upon which they grow and from which they derive their nourishment, belonging to another. It is much to be wished that Christians would remember that a similar distinction exists as to themselves. They belong to Christ, and though they are in the world they should not be of the world. (John 17: 9-11)

AN ASTONISHING RECOVERY.

MUCH interest has been excited in Jamaica, L. I., by the remarkable restoration to health of a lady who has been paralysed for ten years. She was afflicted, about the end of the year 1880, with a spinal trouble which the physicians who attended her were unable to relieve. She gradually became worse and finally lost the use of her legs. She has not been able to walk since, and for the greater part of the time has been confined to bed. Occasionally she was able to get about on crutches, and during one of these periods was taken on a visit to a friend of the family living a few miles away. A few days ago, while sitting in her friend's house, looking at some pictures, she suddenly felt a rush of life through her limbs and declared herself able to walk. Since then she has walked considerable distances without fatigue. She is unable to account for her recovery. All that she can say about it is that power "seemed to come and she walked. It is not so with those who are enabled to walk in the ways of the Lord after vain efforts in their own strength. When power is given to them they know that it comes from him who "giveth power to the faint, and to him that hath no might increaseth strength." (Isa 40: 29.)

BLIND AND DEAF AND DUMB.

A VERY interesting process is going on in respect to a child who was in Brooklyn, N. Y., last week. She is an inmate of the Perkins Institute for the Blind, near Boston, Mass. Her teacher is a Brooklyn lady who, coming home for Thanksgiving, brought her pupil with her. The child was born seven years ago on a ranch in Texas. When she was only fifteen months old she suffered from a severe illness which left her a blind, deaf mute. She remained at home until a year ago utterly uneducated. Her parents knew of no way to reach an understanding to which all the three ordinary avenues were closed. Her case was, however, made known to the manager of the Boston Institution in December, 1890, and she was admitted there. At that time she was wild and intractable and was subject to fits of passion in which she would bite and kick and strike with a strength beyond her years. A teacher was assigned to her who has won a complete ascendancy over her, has taught her to read, to use a vocabulary of about six hundred words in the sign language, and to pronounce about twenty short words. The way in which so much knowledge was communicated is very interesting. The word "hat" was the first word to reach her understanding. Her teacher, watching for an opportunity, saw the child take up a small shallow basket and, after fingering it for a minute, put it on her head. The teacher put a hat into her hands, and then on the palm of the little hand made the blind alphabet characters signifying hat. This was repeated until the child evidently perceived that objects had names, and this object that particular name. By this method the names of other objects were communicated. Then by putting her fingers on her teacher's lips while the latter pronounced a word translated at the same time in the blind alphabet characters the child was encouraged to imitate the motions and to speak a few words audibly. The strange feature about a training so ingenious and so intelligent is that special pains have been taken to prevent any idea of God or religion reaching her. The manager of the institution is desirous of ascertaining in the person of this child if the idea of a Supreme Being is innate in the human mind. He expects that as the development of her intellect proceeds and the world begins to arrange itself in her mind, she will ask questions about its origin, and he can then learn whether in a mind which has received no suggestion on the subject from visible objects or from other human beings, there is any conception of God and a hereafter. It is a cruel experiment and unworthy of the people who have done so much for the child's temporal welfare. To satisfy a metaphysical curiosity they are excluding from her mind ideas which would elevate it and enrich it. The responsibility is a grave one, for an affirmative answer has never been given to the question asked of Job (11: 7), "Canst thou by searching find out God?" It may be hoped that the experiment will not be protracted but that it may end in God revealing himself to her darkened mind in answer to the prayers of Christians who believe that "the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom and the knowledge of the Holy is understanding." (Pro. 9: 10.)

VERTICAL LIGHTS.

SEAMEN will be thankful for a discovery just reported as to the lights in lighthouses. Some recent experiments in lighthouse signalling in England have shown some remarkable results from directing the light vertically to the sky, instead of horizontally across the water. When all weather conditions are favorable the light of the Eddystone Lighthouse, as ordinarily directed, can be seen seventeen and a half miles at sea, but it was found that a beam of light of much less power, directed vertically, was visible exactly twice as far, and could be well discerned through an ordinary fog. It might have been thought that the more useful light would be one cast on the waters, but it appears to be otherwise. It is often so in spiritual matters. Better than revealing the dark places of the earth to young people is the upward light that directs their thoughts to the skies, and leads them to fix their affections on things above. (Col. 3: 2.)

A FATAL ROAD.

GROUSE CREEK road, in Cowley County, Kansas, has attained a somewhat unenviable notoriety of late years. Horse-thieves have made it a camping ground, and other thieves have used it for a rendezvous. The road has a long record of robberies and murders. A few years ago a traveller was taken down this road in a hack, was beaten senseless and robbed of a large sum of money. The city marshal of Coffeyville was murdered there while pursuing a horse-thief. An old man from a distance who rode down the road was taken off his horse, robbed, stripped, gagged and turned loose, barefoot, on the burned prairie to make his way the best he could to Arkansas City. One desperate thief who took refuge down the road was pursued by a vigilance committee and lynched. Several bodies of unknown men, with shot-wounds in them have been found near the road. Travellers are warned against going down the road if people in the vicinity know they are going in that direction. These warnings have doubtless saved many lives, for no one cares to needlessly venture his life in a place where there have been so many victims. Would that the similar warnings against the path of sin and vice had the same effect! That path is still thronged, though in every generation multitudes fall there and many centuries ago the wise king uttered his warning: "Avoid it, pass not by it, turn from it and pass away." (Prov. 4: 1-5.)

AN AFRICAN WIFE'S BURDEN.

RECENT explorers of the Upper Congo describe a strange custom which prevails among the Bayanzi. Such of the men as can afford it decorate their wives with a large brass ring which is welded around their necks. The richer the men, the larger the rings their wives wear. One traveller says he has seen women wearing rings which must have weighed thirty pounds. At first the neck becomes raw by the chafing of the ring, but after a while it becomes calloused, although a woman has to hold the ring up frequently to get relief from the weight. The women are proud of the ornament, believing that it enhances their importance and beauty. Wives in our own land have reason to be thankful that such a custom does not prevail here, though here, too, the effort to enhance their importance and beauty sometimes involves burdens grievous to bear. In all ranks and conditions of life, men as well as women are bearing spiritual burdens of which they might be relieved if they would accept the invitation of him who said, "Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and my yoke is easy and my burden is light." (Matt. 11: 28-30.)

What had happened to this man that he should answer, "It is not I?" It was the most truthful answer, in the sense in which he uttered it, that he could have given. The man August, as the woman called him, was dead. In his place stood a new man, the same yet not the same. That had happened to him which we call regeneration. His old life, his old motives, and joys, and aims were annihilated. He was a new man, having been born again. A year or two before this meeting, the woman had known and loved him well. He had returned her love and the two together had gone to the theatre, had been companions in pleasure and had been friends of the closest kind. She was not the only one in that crowd who had known him in those days. There were men there whom he had greeted joyously and who had acknowledged him their leader in sinful excesses. Of them, too, he was now oblivious. They, too, had to admit that this was not their friend, August.

Some fifteen years before, this man, then a promising youth was stretched on a bed of sickness. Death seemed imminent. His mother, the angelic Monica, had bent over him, weeping. She reminded him of all she had taught him of Jesus and begged him to give himself now in what seemed his last hours to the Saviour. He promised her that he would. Monica rejoiced and it seemed to her a double blessing when her beloved boy began to recover from his sickness. He would, she thought, be restored to her in a double sense. Her boy, with his wonderful beauty and his brilliant talents and almost precocious learning would live and he would be a Christian. That last was in Monica's eyes the greatest blessing of all. But when he recovered he postponed his baptism and in spite of all her prayers he turned his back on Christ.

Inheriting from his father, who was a pagan, a strongly sensual disposition, he gave himself up to evil associations, and when shortly afterward he was sent to a vicious and corrupt city to pursue his studies with the view to becoming a pleader and orator, he abandoned himself wholly to vice. But he did not neglect learning. It was a passion with him and he was ambitious. He amazed his companions and his teachers by his extraordinary powers which seemed unimpaired by the gross excesses of his life outside the schools. He was as eager in the pursuit of knowledge as in his pursuit of pleasure, and he seemed to have an equal power of throwing all his heart into either pursuit.

But the change came. He went to hear the famous preacher—one Ambrose. As he frankly tells us, he went there to find out the secret of the preacher's power over his hearers. It was a professional interest and he had a supreme contempt for the doctrines and precepts enunciated. He was disappointed in the oratory. The preacher had a high, thin voice and much less oratorical power than he had been led to expect from the effects of his preaching. But the Holy Spirit carried the preacher's words to his heart. For a long time he was in agony. He was unable to find light. The struggle almost sundered his hold on life. At last he went away into the country to a friend's house to be alone and think. One day, walking alone in his friend's garden, still in the throes of conviction, he flung himself on the ground in an agony of despair. He could not, he could not part with his sins.

As he lay there he heard from a neighboring house what he supposed to be the voice of a boy or girl, chanting like the refrain of a song, the words "Tolle, lege; Tolle, lege." Take and read; take and read. Wondering what kind of game the children could be playing in which such words were sung, he began to meditate on them. What if that were a voice of direction from heaven to him? He took up a book which he had received from Ambrose and opened it at random. It was Paul's Epistle to the Romans, and the first words on which his eyes were lifted were: "Put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make not provision for the flesh to fulfil the lusts thereof." Those words were a mandate to him from heaven. From that day forth his steps were toward the light. He remained for a time in seclusion, and when he went back to the city it was to resign his honors and offices and to devote himself wholly and unreservedly to the service of Christ. He was a new man. All that he had been was cast away and henceforth he lived the life of one who had died and been raised again in newness of life. Thus it was that he answered the woman. "It is not I," and the scenes of vice and revelry with which he was so familiar once knew him no more forever. As St. Augustine, the greatest of the four great fathers of the church, his name has been venerated for fifteen centuries for his spirituality, his consecration and his devotion to the cause of Christ.

THE SCOTCH.

A BASKET of heather sent us a few days ago from Scotland filled us with Scotch reminiscences. What a hearty people the Scotch are! They are not ashamed to cry, with their broad palms wiping away the tears, and they make no attempt at suppression of glee. They do not simmer, or snigger, or chuckle. Throw a joke into a Scotchman's ear and it rolls down to the centre of his diaphragm and then spreads out both ways, towards foot and brow, until the emotion becomes volcanic, and his whole body is in paroxysm of cachinnation.

No half and half about the Scotch character. What he hates, he hates; what he likes, he likes. And he lets you know it right away. He is altogether Liberal or Tory. His politics decided, his religion decided; get him right, and he is magnificently right; get him wrong, and he is awfully wrong. A Scotchman seldom changes. By the time he has landed fairly on his feet in this world he has made up his mind, and he keeps it made up. If he dislikes a fiddle in church you cannot smuggle it in under the name of a bass viol. We like persistence. Life is so short that a man cannot afford very often to change his mind. If the Israelites in the wilderness had had a few Scotch leaders, instead of wandering about for forty years, they would in three weeks have got to the promised land, or somewhere else just as decided.

But national characteristics are gradually giving way. The Tweed is drying up. The Atlantic ocean under steam pressure is becoming a Fulton Ferry. When I asked John Bright fifteen years ago if he was ever coming to America, he said:

"No, America comes to me!"

Besides that, American breadstuffs and American meat must have their effect on European character. All careful observers know that what men eat mightily affects their character. The missionary among the Indians, compelled to live on animal food, gets some of the nature of the aborigines, whether he will or not. The Anchor line of steamers running from New York to Glasgow take great cargoes of American meat to Scotland. The meat of animals butchered in America is kept on steamers in a cool draught especially arranged for that purpose, and the meat market of Scotland is being revolutionized. The Scotchman eating American beef and American mutton and American venison becomes partly American. The Englishman eating American wheat and American rye and American corn must become in part Americanized. And here is an element of safety which political economists would do well to recognize. The cereals and the meats of one nation becoming the food of other nations, it prophesies assimilation and brotherhood. It will be very difficult for American beef to fight American beef, and American mutton to fight American mutton, and American corn to fight American corn, though it may be found on the opposite side of the Atlantic. The world is gradually sitting down at one table, and the bread will be of American wheat, and it will be cut with Sheffield knives. The rice will be brought from Carolina swamps, and cooked with Newcastle coal, and set on the table in Burslem pottery, while the air comes through the window upholstered with Nottingham lace. And Italy will provide the raisins, and Brazil the nuts, and all nations add their part to the universal festivity. What a time of accord when all the world breakfasts and dines and sups together.

TO BACKSLIDERS.

THERE is a whole army of them. They once sat at the communion-table. They sit there no more. Once they prayed. They pray no more. Once upon their eyes there came the vision of a pardoning Jesus, but now they stand with both their feet on the bleeding heart of the Son of God. Oh, wandering brother, you cast God off, do you? Will it be strange if God casts you off? It will be harder for you at the last than for those who never took the first step heavenward. You showed that you knew your duty. How about all those precious scenes in which you once commingled? Where are they now? How can you meet Christ at last—that Jesus whom you have been persecuting by a wandering life. How can you look Him in the face at the last? Are you happy, oh, backslider? No, no, you have not seen an hour of happiness since you gave up your hope, and wandered off, perhaps to please a sceptical companion. You say: "Oh, if I could only get back to those good old times when I did serve God." The most wretched condition in all the world is that of a man who once was a member of the Church, and sat at holy communion, who has gone back? But Jesus will be just as glad to have you come now as He was the first time you started for Him. He waits to be gracious. Trust Him. He will say nothing about what you have said against Him. He will say nothing about the days of your wandering. He will say nothing about the fact that you have been sitting in the seat of the scorners, and laughed at Christianity, and despised that which you once loved. He will not throw that up to you at all, no more than did the father when the prodigal came back. The father did not say anything to the prodigal about his poor clothes or his hungered face; but he went right away to clothe him, and to robe him, and to feast him. And Christ will not say anything about what you have been doing so long, if you will only come to him now, and do your work over again.

PICKLED CHRISTIANS.

THERE is a class of persons in the community whose usefulness we have just found out. We never realized until now what they were made for. They are struck through with acidity. Their disposition is celebrated for its crabbedness. You find them in every circle. They are especially known in Churches as fault-finders. Their teeth are always on edges. They are critical of minister, elder-ship, and choir. Whatever is done they act as though they could have done it better. You sometimes feel like suggesting to them the propriety of going to some other Church, or retiring into less conspicuous position. You look upon them as a nuisance and hindrance.

Stop! You are wrong. They have their practical uses. Church life if happily conducted, is a banquet at which the sweet predominates. There is the sugar of helpful words, and the saccharine of genial association. The banquet is in danger of becoming flat and insipid. There ought to be at least one vinegar cruet in the castor. You need to give variety to the feast. You do not more need spices than pickles. Now you know the use to which some people can be put. Do not cast them out. Do not let them be the means of exasperation. Employ them at the Church banquet. Tarts are good in their place. Brethren, pass around the pickles.

BRIEF NOTES.

Rev. A. J. Witherspoon, well-known in connection with the Seaman's Bethel at New Orleans, is dead. His death was sudden and unexpected. He was residing at the time at Moss Point, Miss.

Gipsy Smith has been holding successful meetings at the Central M. E. Church, New York. At the service on the evening of November 22d, the church was crowded to its utmost capacity.

St. Bartholomew's Protestant Episcopal Church, New York, of which Dr. Greer is rector, has purchased the building formerly occupied by the Sawyer Memorial Universalist Church for use as a Swedish Mission.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey have been holding services in the Polytechnic Institution in London. Thence they went to Edinburgh, where they held a conference with prominent ministers to decide on plans for a year's Evangelistic work.

Rev. C. W. Millard, D. D., delivered a lecture on Dec. 8, before the American Institute of Christian Philosophy, in Hamilton Hall, Columbia College, New York. His subject was, "Matter and Man." The next meeting of the Institute will be on January 5, at the same place.

The sum of ten dollars has been received from a subscriber who gives it "In our Saviour's Name" for Dr. Dowkontt's work in training Medical Missionaries for labor in foreign lands and in ministering to the sick poor of New York. It has been paid over to Dr. Dowkontt, who desires us to express his sincere thanks.

Mr. Charles Inglis sailed for England to-day (Dec. 9) after a season of successful evangelistic labor. During his stay in Chicago he lectured to the students in the Moody Institute every day and held services in the evening. Since leaving Chicago he has been holding meetings in Richmond, Va., where the old Market Hall was crowded every night by eager and attentive hearers.

Mr. and Mrs. Baker, the blind singing Evangelists, whose portraits appeared recently in this journal, have been holding services in Bethany Church, Philadelphia. Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman spoke every evening, and a great blessing has been given to the effort. Over one hundred members have been added to the church who ascribe their conversion to God's blessing on the services.

Union services, in which Presbyterians and Methodists have united, have been held at Union City, Pa., by Rev. M. S. Rees, who after serving in the pastorate for five and a half years is now devoting himself exclusively to evangelistic work. He has been greatly blessed at Union City during these meetings. More than one hundred souls have been led to seek Christ by God's blessing on his labors. So thoroughly has the whole neighborhood been stirred that the principal places of business have closed at an early hour to allow their employees to attend the services.

The Madison Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York, is about to enter on a new line of Christian work. The pastor, Rev. Charles D. Thompson, D. D., at a recent meeting of the church pointed out the urgent necessity of engaging in special work among the poor, spiritual, educational and reformatory. It was decided to hold special services every week, to engage a special corps of trained Christian workers, to reduce the price of pews and make many of them free and to engage an assistant for the pastor. The pastor said that these changes would involve an expenditure of $15,000 to begin with and he would give one thousand toward it. One of his members rose and gave $5,000 and the remainder was raised at the meeting.

A CONVERTS' CHAPTER.

ISAIAH 12.

THIS week we get the one great Chapter for Converts. In all the Bible there is no portion of Scripture so good, so fitting, so just to the point for one who has lately been born into the Kingdom of God, as the twelfth of Isaiah.

The only way to get into this old world is to be born into it; and so the only way to get into the family of God is to be born into it; and we are never born, in either case, full-fledged men and women, but babes; wee, tiny, little bits of babes, who need milk and not meat. Now, some Scripture would be poison, or death, to these. So we must rightly divide the word of truth unto them, keeping them away from things not easily understood. If I know aught about it, the kitchen is no mean place in a home, and from it goes gruel, crackers, toast and tea to the sick-room; light foods to the nursery, and the solids for the big folks. That's the way to plan in the household of faith.

Here is the Children's portion; after giving the chapter pamed at the head, we then read and study:

|               |   |   |   |                        |
|---------------|---|---|---|------------------------|
| John xv       | - | - | - | The Abiding Chapter    |
| I Peter ii    | - | - | - | The Christian Chapter  |
| Proverbs iii  | - | - | - | The Wisdom Chapter     |
| Ephesians iii | - | - | - | The Bottomless Chapter |
| Psalm xviii   | - | - | - | The Deliverance Psalm  |
| Psalm xxxii   | - | - | - | The Instruction Psalm  |
| Psalm xci     | - | - | - | The Safety Psalm       |
| Job xxix      | - | - | - | The Character Chapter  |
| Hebrews xi    | - | - | - | The Faith Chapter      |
| James ii      | - | - | - | The Work Chapter       |
| Ephesians vi  | - | - | - | The Soldier's Chapter  |

Also other Scriptures of the same character, such as Matt. 5:6 and 7, Exodus 20, Isaiah 41 and the books of Philippians, John, Nehemiah and Colossians. After these can come Luke, Acts, etc.

How to Study the Bible by Topics.

Just study Salvation. That's the first thing a man want's to know about. Who gives it? To whom is it given? How it is gotten. What it is when we get it. What it does for a sinner. A study of David's life will give it; also that of Peter. Begin with Isaiah xii, 3, and end with Jude 24. See what it saves from, and what it saves to. Look at the things that represent it, like rock, tower, helmet, lamp, etc. Close by taking a heavy portion for your heavy heart.

Then look up all the Bible says about Praise. This will set the dumb man singing. Samuel and Psalms are food books for this. Follow this with the study of the Blood. Begin with the Passover and end with Calvary. Get God's estimate of it. Then apply it to your sin-burdened heart. John 19:34, and Eph. 1:7.

THE DOCTRINES.—Take the seven great doctrines of the Bible:

God, Man, Sin, Redemption, Justification, Regeneration, Sanctification.

Give these all a full and complete research, and you will come out a regular Theologian and strong Christian.

The way to study the Bible by topics, is to study it so. Take any one great theme and study it. I like the following: Love, joy, grace, light, prayer, obedience, faith, power, Holy Spirit, truth, wisdom, able, punishment, heaven, reward, mercy, humility, angels, and a hundred more.

A good many long for Peace; well, if they would go to the God of Peace and His written Word, they would soon have so much that, in describing it, they would say it was "boundless."

Love For Bible Reading.

Just a word to you who don't love to read the Bible, and I am writing to thousands now. Give the following a trial, and if you don't change your mind after doing it, you had better see the doctor quick, for "Trouble in the head."

God likens us all to sheep; and Jesus is called the LAMB OF GOD. Take the Book, hold it closed in your lap for five minutes, in some nook of the home, where all is quiet, that you may draw in your thoughts from all else, and centre them on this theme; then remember there are just three great "Shepherd" Chapters in the Bible. John 10, Ezekiel 34, and Psalm 23. Read them in the order I have named, and you will be enriched with gold from the city four-square.

RECORD OF THE WEEK.

Death of a Bonaparte—Sir Edwin Arnold's Visit—270 Lives Lost at Sea—Lord Lytton's Last Hours—Civil War in China—A Clergyman Shot at—General Notes.

DESPATCHES from Manzanillo, Mex., state that the brig Tahiti, with 270 Gilbert Islanders aboard, under contract to work on the coffee plantations of San Benito, Mex., has been lost at sea. Besides the islanders—who were really slaves—the Tahiti had a crew of 21 persons, all of whom are supposed to have perished when she foundered. She touched at Drake's Bay, near San Francisco, late in September. The American steamer Roseville passed her quite lately near Lizard Point, floating bottom upward. It was evident that she had capsized. All the port rigging had been cut away in an attempt to right her. Her boats were gone, but there is little hope that any one was saved.

Lord Lytton's Last Hours.

LORD LYTTON, whose demise in Paris was noticed in these columns last week, may be almost said to have died while writing his last poem.

LORD LYTTON.

Interesting details of his last day of life are furnished by his physician, Dr. Prendergast. "Only the night before his death," said the physician, "he was so cheerful and lively that it seems impossible to realize that he has gone. He was laughing and chatting with his English nurse while composing his last poem. He was very fond of tea, which the nurse prepared for him at four in the morning. Being gifted with poetic tastes, and greatly admiring His Lordship's talents, she began by his direction to repeat some lines of Keats, when Lord Lytton interrupted her, laughing and saying: 'No, nurse, you are not correct; the lines run thus—adding, 'Now nurse, hand down the volume from the shelf and let me correct myself.' The body was embalmed and taken to England. Lady Lytton had a cast of her husband's face taken by Bonnat, the famous sculptor. Notabilities all over the civilized world have sent their condolences to the widow of the distinguished dead.

Devoured by the Earth.

An eyewitness of the Japanese earthquake writes from Nagoja, giving details of the calamity that show it to have been, beyond doubt, the direct visitation of modern times. He says: "Nagoja is in ruins. The town is strewn with the dead, and the hospitals are overrun with mangled victims of the most terrible calamity the country has known within the memory of foreigners. The surface of the earth for hundreds and hundreds of square miles was shaken like a carpet, was ripped, torn, bounced up and down, and twisted in every direction. Through the great crevices where the earth had split open were spouted sticky mud, hot salt water, and sand. As the earth settled back the crevices would partially close their cavernous jaws, in more than one instance on human prey. The action of the ground was exactly as if the earth's crust was a thin scum over a boiling, seething caldron, and yet here at Nagoja the sticky mud emitted is found only 500 feet below the surface. In some localities it was hardly possible for a man to crawl on all fours. It was as well to try to float a brick house in midocean as to build one to survive such an ordeal as this. The houses whose roofs are mingled with their foundations in ugly heaps at every turn, the majestic temples whose graceful curves are distorted and whose gilded bells and brazen gongs are jangled into a hideous mass of splintered timbers, these went down in a moment too short to allow the escape of inmates, too swift for the temple worshippers to unbend their bowed heads. And the earthquake drew no invidious distinction. Shintoist, Buddhist, Christian; all were alike made victims of its rage. At Nagoja, the crumbling walls of a church fell on the head of a Christian congregation, and a heathen temple at Ichinomiya buried under its tiles the corpses of men whose spiritual light came from heathen gods. This earthquake is said by a celebrated engineer, Major-General Palmer of the British Army, to have been the severest in the history of mankind. It must take six or eight months, at the very least, to repair the damage done to the railway. Dead bodies are piled near the Kaizenii temple's gate at Ogaki, and sufferers are all around, some pressed with hunger, some distraught with grief at the loss of their children and parents; others, half maddened between hunger, fear and sorrow, are attempting to end their lives, while others again stare at the dead bodies of their dear ones. The most touching sight to the spectator is the little children who have lost their parents and have in many cases no relatives that they know. They are wandering about crying or biting their fingers. The latest estimate was that the number killed at the three cities of Gifu, Ogaki, and Nagoja was about 12,000. Great cracks, one of them eighty miles in length, opened in the ground, swallowing up human beings, and then closed up again. A village of eighty-nine houses about two miles from Gifu disappeared and sank two hundred feet below the level of the ground. A remarkable effect of the earthquake was the change made in the summit of Fujiyama, the sacred mountain of Japan. A tremendous gap has been made in the mountain. Officials investigated and found that on the northern side of the summit a portion of the mountain some 1,200 feet in width had subsided a depth of about 600 feet.

Cyrus W. Field Seriously Ill.

AMERICANS generally will regret to learn that Cyrus W. Field, the millionaire philanthropist and the man through whose enterprise the first Atlantic cable was laid, is lying dangerously ill at his home in New York City. Owing to the sudden mental breakdown of his son, Edward M. Field,—the principal partner in a stock-broking and commission firm which had failed—the father who had been troubled considerably about his son for months past gave way under the intense strain. At his advanced age the physicians have but little hope of his recovery. Cyrus W. Field was born in Stockbridge, Mass., in 1819, and when fifteen years old set out to New York to carve out his own fortune. His first position was that of a clerk in A. T. Stewart's store and at 21 he went into business for himself, as a paper manufacturer. About 1855 the idea was suggested to him by his brother Matthew of laying an Atlantic cable and before 1858, such was the extraordinary energy put into the project by Mr. Field that the ocean was spanned and the new world and the old were electrically united. Four wealthy gentlemen each put $200,000 in the enterprise. The first cable soon broke but the projectors were not dismayed and another was laid. John Bright has called Cyrus Field the "modern Columbus," and the enthusiastic appreciation of his cable triumph was world-wide. Honors were heaped upon him, and he rapidly grew rich, as the various cable companies with which he was connected encircled the globe. A loss of part of his fortune in 1887 was followed by severe domestic affliction that did much to impair the alert and vigorous physique of the man who had achieved so much, and now his latest prostration seems to have left him almost hopeless. Mr. Field, whose portrait is here given, is one of five brothers, nearly all of whom have won distinction. David Dudley Field is a famous lawyer and codifier; Stephen

J. Field is a Supreme Court Judge, and Henry M. Field is the editor of The Evangelist, and an author of considerable note.

A Clergyman's Life Attempted.

WHEN Rev. Dr. John Hall of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York, left the church after forenoon service on Sunday, November 29, he was followed by a crazy mechanic, named John George Roth, who fired three shots at him from a revolver. The clergyman fortunately escaped unhurt. Roth was arrested and proved to be a crank who had the names of Bishop Potter, Judge Hilton and several others down on a memorandum book, and whose pockets were full of documents showing him to have been subject to delusions, and determined to avenge himself on society for some fancied grievance. Dr. Hall's escape was little short of miraculous as Roth took deliberate aim each time he fired at the clergyman, the last bullet clipping off a piece of the brownstone coping at the entrance to Dr. Hall's residence, No. 712 5th Avenue, as the latter was going in.

Sir Edwin Arnold's Visit.

Few foreigners have been more honored by the American literary cult on visiting our shores, than Sir Edwin Arnold, whose arrival was noted in a recent issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. This is a tribute partly to his greatness as a writer, and partly to the pleasure he affords us in his double role of philosopher and traveler. We give in this column portraits of Sir Edwin and his daughter Miss Katherine Lilian Arnold, who has been his companion during his long, fourteen months' sojourn in Japan, and who, possibly more than most travelled European or American ladies, has made a study of native life and habits in that attractive country. Sir Edwin's country home was at Azabu, near Tokyo, where his picturesque dwelling and its beautiful surroundings were well-known to travelers. His books on the Japanese, their etiquette, cuisine and social observance, afford delightful reading and abound in a genial philosophy. They give us a better and pleasanter acquaintance with this ancient nation than any volumes that have been written in recent years.

China's Rebellion Begun.

OMINOUS mutterings of rebellion, which have disturbed the Chinese Empire for many months past, have at last culminated in open insurrection against the government. What that inert and seemingly helpless administration recently officially designated as "a raid of Mongolian robbers" in the northern provinces proved to be the opening phases of a revolt of grave proportions, embracing not alone Mongolia but several provinces hitherto regarded as wholly loyal. After committing various atrocities the rebel force consisting of several squadrons of cavalry and infantry, advanced upon the position occupied by the imperial troops near Ching-Kiang in Manchuria. The latter had 4000 men, while the rebels led by the Llama (priest) were much stronger and routed the imperial army, which fled leaving 700 killed and wounded on the field. The victorious rebels then took up their march in the direction of Peking, where hurried preparations were made to defend the city. Chen-kin-lung a rebel Kalao leader has been captured and executed by the imperial authorities. Six thousand imperial troops have been sent from Tien-tsin to oppose the rebel army. The latter, before the battle at Ching-Kiang, had already captured the important walled city of Leao-Yang in Manchuria. Details have also been received of the massacre of Belgian missionaries and native Christians at Tayou and Sanchi by the Chinese. The rioters killed the nuns after subjecting them to gross indignities. A Belgian priest was brained at a blow, his body mutilated and his heart and tongue taken out and burned. The native Christians were horribly tortured, and their children roasted alive. No attempt was made by the mandarins to check the violence of the rioters. Several officials, after the massacre, spread a feast for the murderers and gave a fete in their honor. Manchuria and Mongolia, where the rebellion began, are outside of China proper and separated from it by the Great Wall. The imperial government will make a strong effort to prevent the enemy from passing the Wall. The overthrow of the present dynasty seems not improbable.

Death of a Bonaparte.

A DISTINGUISHED member of the house of Bonaparte, who was less a politician than litterateur and savant, Prince Louis Lucien Bonaparte, died in Italy recently. Prince Louis was a son of Lucien Bonaparte, a brother of the first Napoleon, and was born in England in 1813 and passed the greater part of his life there. He cared very little for the strife and excitements of public life, but after the revolution of 1848, he consented to be a candidate for the French Legislative Assembly and several years later attained the dignity of a Senator. Prince Louis possessed a wide knowledge of languages, and his philological acquirements and the valuable researches he conducted secured appropriate recognition in the form of a pension from the British government. A portrait of the Prince is given above.

LUCIEN BONAPARTE.

NEWS NOTES.

Mexico's corn and bean crop has failed, owing to drought. Corn is at famine prices.

War reports from Berlin greatly excited the Russian Bourse at St. Petersburg during the past week.

Several earthquake shocks were felt at Seattle, Wash., last week, lasting about five seconds each.

It is reported in Washington that Gen. Lewis A. Grant, Assistant-Secretary of War, will in all likelihood be Secretary Proctor's successor.

Mr. Blaine's physician, Dr. Madison Taylor, of Philadelphia, states that the Secretary is now a well man, and constantly improving in general health.

A number of workmen on the Northern Pacific Railroad at Tacoma, Wash., were buried by a landslide a few days ago. Twelve were killed outright.

A new treaty has been concluded between the United States and Hawaii, providing for absolute reciprocity in the import and export of product and manufactures.

Under President Peixotto's rule, Brazilian affairs are beginning to resume their normal condition. He has issued a decree recalling the Congress which Fonseca dissolved. A new Presidential election is generally favored.

RESURRECTION POWER.

"That I may know him, and the power of his resurrection."—Philippians 3: 10.

It is insinuated in these days that a belief in the righteousness of faith will lead men to care little for good works, that it will act as a sedative to their zeal, and therefore they will exhibit no ardor for holiness. The very reverse is seen in the case of the apostle, and in the case of all who cast aside the righteousness of the law, that they may be clothed with that righteousness "which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith." Paul made a list of his advantages as to confidence in the flesh, and they were very great; but he turned his back upon them all for Christ's sake; but accepting Christ to be everything to him, did he, therefore, sit down in self-content, and imagine that personal

Character was Nothing?

By no manner of means. Be you sure of this, that the less you value your own righteousness, the more will you seek after true holiness; the less you think of your own beauty, the more ardently will you long to become like the Lord Jesus. Those who dream of being saved by their good works are usually those who have no good works worth mentioning; while those who sincerely lay aside all hope of salvation by their own merits, are fruitful in every virtue to the praise of God.

What, then, was the object of the apostle's ardor? It was "that I may know him, and the power of his resurrection." Paul already knew the Lord Jesus by faith; he knew so much of him as to be able to teach others. He had looked to Jesus, and known the power of his death; but he now desired that the vision of his faith might become still better known by experience. You may know a man, and have an idea that he is powerful; but to know him and his power over you, is a stage further. You may have read of a man so as to be familiar with his history and his character, and yet you may have no knowledge of him and of his personal influence over yourself. Paul desired intimate acquaintance with the Lord Jesus, personal intercourse with the Lord to such a degree that he should feel his power at every point, and know the effect of all that he had wrought out in his life, death, and resurrection.

The Power over Death.

This morning we will confine our thoughts to one theme, and unite with the apostle in a strong desire to know our Lord in connection with the power of his resurrection. The resurrection of the Lord Jesus was in itself a marvellous display of power. I do not know whether I can convey my own thought to you; but what strikes me very forcibly is this—no mere man going to his grave could say, "I have power to take my life again." The departure of life leaves the man necessarily powerless; he cannot restore himself to life. Behold the sacred body of Jesus, embalmed in spices, and wrapped about with linen; it is laid within the sealed and guarded tomb; how can it come forth to life? Yet Jesus said: "I have power to take my life again"; and he proved it true. If, in the extremity of his weakness, he had the power to rise out of the sepulchre, and come forth in newness of life, what can he not now accomplish?

I do not think, however, that Paul is here thinking so much of the power displayed in the resurrection, as of the power which comes out of it, which may most properly be called, "the power of his resurrection." This the apostle desired to apprehend and to know. This is a very wide subject, and I cannot encompass the whole region; but many things may be said under four heads.

I. First, the power of our Lord's resurrection is

An Evidencing Power.

Here I shall liken it to a seal which is set to a document to make it sure. Our Lord's resurrection from the dead was a proof that he was the Messiah, that he had come upon the Father's business, that he was the Son of God, and that the covenant which Jehovah had made with him was henceforth ratified and established. He was "declared to be the Son of God with power, according to the spirit of holiness, by the resurrection from the dead."

So much is the resurrection the proof of our Lord's mission, that it falls to the ground without it. If our Lord Jesus had not risen from the dead, our faith in him would have lacked the corner-stone of the foundation on which it rests. Were he dead still, his death would have been like the death of any other person, and would have given us no assurance of acceptance. His life, with all the beauty of its holiness, would have been simply a perfect example of conduct, but it could not have become our righteousness if his burial in the tomb of Joseph had been the end. It was essential for the

and his death-suffering, that he should be raised from the dead. If he had not risen, but were still among the dead, you might well tell us that we preach to you a cunningly devised fable. See, then, the power of his resurrection: it proves to a demonstration the faith once delivered to the saints. Supported by infallible proofs, it becomes itself the infallible proof of the authority, power, and glory of Jesus, the Son of God.

I beg you further to notice that this proof had such power about it to the minds of the apostles, that they preached with singular boldness. These chosen witnesses had seen the Lord after his resurrection; one of them had put his finger into the print of the nails, and others had eaten and drunk with him: they were sure that they were not deceived. They knew that he was dead, for they had been present at his burial: they knew that he lived again, for they had heard him speak, and had seen him eat a piece of a broiled fish and of an honeycomb. The fact was as clear to them as it was wonderful. Peter and the rest of them without hesitation declared, "This Jesus hath God raised up, whereof we are all witnesses."

Honest Witnesses,

there were in more than sufficient number, who declare that Jesus, who died on Calvary, and was buried in the tomb of Joseph of Arimathea, did arise again from the dead. In the mouth of many witnesses this fact is established; and this fact established proves other blessed facts.

The resurrection of Christ casts a side-light upon the Gospel by proving its reality and literalness. There is a tendency in this generation to spirit away the truth, and in the doing thereof to lose both the truth and its spirit. In these evil days fact is turned into myth, and truth into opinion. The blessings of the Gospel are substantial facts, and not mere theological opinions. As the resurrection of the Lord Jesus Christ from the dead was a plain visible matter of fact, so are the pardon of sin and the salvation of the soul matters of actual experience, and not the creatures of imagination.

Brethren, such is the evidencing power of the resurrection of Christ, that when every other argument fails your faith, you may find safe anchorage in this assured fact. The currents of doubt may bear you towards the rocks of mistrust; but when your anchor finds no other hold, it may grip the fact of the resurrection of Christ from the dead. This must be true. The witnesses are too many to have been deceived; and their patient deaths on account of their belief, proved that they were not only honest men, but good men, who valued truth more than life. Oh, that any of you who are drifting may be brought to a resting-place by this fact! If you doubt the possibility of your own pardon, this may aid you to believe, for Jesus lives. From this first solid stone of the resurrection, you may go, step by step, over the stream of doubt, till you land on the other side, fully assured of your salvation in Christ.

II. We will deal next upon

The Justifying Power

of his resurrection. Under the first head I compared the resurrection to a seal; under this second head I must liken it to a note of acquittance, or a receipt. Our Lord's rising from the dead was a discharge in full, from the High Court of Justice, from all those liabilities which he had undertaken on our behalf.

Observe, first, that our Lord must have fully paid the penalty due to sin. He was discharged because he had satisfied the claim of justice. All that the law could possibly demand was the fulfilment of the sentence, "The soul that sinneth, it shall die." There is no getting away from that doom: life must be taken for sin committed. Christ Jesus is our substitute and sacrifice. He came into the world to vindicate the law, and he has achieved it by the offering of himself. He has been dead and buried, and he has now risen from the dead because he has endured death to the full, and there remaineth no more to be done. Brethren, consider this, and let your hearts be filled with joy: the penalty which has come upon you through breaches of the law is paid. Yonder is the receipt. Behold the person of your risen Lord!

"It is Finished."

When our Lord rose from the dead, it was certified that the righteousness, which he came to work out, was finished. For what remained to be done? All was accomplished, and therefore he went up unto his Father's side. Is he toiling there to finish a half-accomplished enterprise? Nay, "This man, after he had offered one sacrifice for sins for ever, sat down on the right hand of God." Our righteousness is a finished one, for Jesus quits the place of humiliation, and rises to his reward. He cried upon the cross, "It is finished!" and his word was true. The Father endorsed his claim by raising him from the dead. Put on, therefore, O ye faithful, this matchless robe of perfect righteousness! It is more than royal, it is divine. It is for you that this best robe is provided. Wear it, and be glad.

His resurrection did not only prove our pardon and our justification, but it proved our full acceptance. "He hath made us accepted in the beloved." Christ is never separated from his people, and therefore whoever he is, they are in him. He is the head; and as is the head, such are the members. When God accepted Christ my Head, he accepted me; when he glorified my Head, he made me a partaker of that glory through my Representative. The infinite delight of the Father in his Only-begotten, is an infinite delight in all the members of his mystic body. I pray that you may feel the power of his resurrection in this respect and become flooded with delight by the conviction that you are accepted, beloved, and delighted in by the Lord God.

III. Thirdly, let us now notice

The Life-Giving Power

of the resurrection of Christ. This will be seen if we perceive that our Lord has life in himself. I showed you this just now, in the fact that he raised himself from the dead. He took up the life which he laid down. He only hath immortality, essential and undervived. Remember how he said, "I am the resurrection and the life." Do not say, "I believe in Christ, and desire life." You have it. Christ and life are not two things. He says, "I am the resurrection and the life." If you have Jesus Christ, you have the resurrection. Oh, that you might now realize what power lies in him who is the resurrection and the life! All the power there is in Christ is there for his people.

Moreover, our Lord has power to quicken whom he will. If the Lord Jesus Christ will this morning speak to the most clay-cold heart in this assembly, it will glow with heavenly life. If the salvation of souls depended upon the preacher, nobody would be saved; but when the preacher's Master comes with him, however feeble his utterance, the life flashes forth, and

The Dead are Raised

See how the dry bones come together! Behold how, at the coming of the divine wind, they stand upon their feet an exceeding great army. What joy to Christian workers is found in the life-giving power of the resurrection! The warrant of Jesus will run through the domain of death and set dead Lazarus free.

This life, whenever it is imparted, is new life. In reading the four evangelists, have you never noticed the difference between Jesus after the resurrection and before? He feels no more suffering, weakness, weariness, reproach, or poverty; he is no more caviated at or opposed by men. He is in the world, but he scarcely seems to touch it, and it does not at all touch him. He was of another world, and only a temporary sojourner on this globe, to which he evidently did not belong. When we believe in Jesus, we receive a new life, and rise to a higher state. The spiritual life owes nothing to the natural life; it is from another source, and tends in another direction. The old life bears the image of the first and earthy Adam; the second life bears the image of the second and heavenly Adam.

The old Life

remains, but becomes to us a kind of death: the new life which God gives is the true life, which is part of the new creation, and links us to the heavenly and divine. To this, I say, the old life is greatly opposed; but that evil life gets not the upper hand. Wonderful is the change wrought by the new birth! Faculties that were in you before are purged and elevated; but, at the same time, new spiritual faculties are conferred, and a new heart and a right spirit are put within us. Wonder at this—that the risen Christ is able to give us an entirely new life. May you know, in this respect, the power of his resurrection!

Wherever Jesus gives life, it is everlasting life. "Christ being risen from the dead, dieth no more; death hath no more dominion over him"; and as we have been raised in the likeness of his resurrection, so are we raised into a life over which death has no more dominion. We shall not die again, but the water which Jesus gives us shall be in us a well of water springing up into everlasting life.

IV. The last point is the Consoling power of the resurrection. This consoling power should be felt as to all departed saints. We are often summoned to the house of mourning in this church; for we seldom pass a week without one or two deaths of beloved ones. Here is our comfort—Jesus says: "Thy dead men shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise."

He is the First-Fruits from among the dead. The world's cemeteries are crowded, precious dust is closely heaped together; but as surely as Jesus rose from the tomb of Joseph, all those who are in him shall rise also. Though bodies may be consumed in the fire, or ground to powder, or sucked up by plants, and fed upon by animals, or made to pass through ten thousand changeable processes, yet difficulties there are none where there is a God. He that gave us bodies when we had none, can restore those bodies when they are pulverized and scattered to the four winds. We sorrow not as those that are without hope. We know where the souls of the godly ones are; they are "forever with the Lord." We know where their bodies will be when the clarion blast shall wake the dead. Sweet is the consolation which comes to us from the empty tomb of Jesus. "God hath both raised up the Lord, and will also raise up us by his own power."

Here, too, is comfort in our inward deaths. In order that we should know the resurrection of Christ, we must be made conformable unto his death. Have we not to die many deaths? Have you ever felt the sentence of that you might not trust in yourself? Have you not seen all your fancied beauty decay, and all your strength wither "like the leaves of the forest when autumn has blown"? Have not all your carnal hopes perished, and all your resolves turned to dust? If any of you are undergoing that process to-day, I hope you will go through with it, till the sword of the Spirit has slain you; for you must die before you can be raised from the dead.

I think there is here great consolation for those of us who mourn because the cause of Christ seems to be in an evil case. I may say to the enemy, "This is your hour, and the power of darkness." Alas! I cry with the holy woman, "They have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid him"! In many a pulpit the precious blood no longer speaks. They have taken the heart out of the doctrine of propitiation, and left us nothing but the name of it. Their false philosophy has overlaid the gospel, and crushed out its life, so far as they are concerned. They boast that we are powerless: our protest is despised, error shows her brazen forehead, and seizes the strongholds of truth. Yet we despair not; nay, we do not even fear. If the cause of Christ were dead and buried, and the wise men had fixed the stone, and set their seal, and appointed their guards, yet, at the appointed hour, the Lord's truth would rise again.

Technical Christians.

That is my close. I desire that you should feel resurrection power. We have many technical Christians, who know the phrases of godliness, but know not the power of godliness. We have ritualistic Christians, who stickle for the outward, but know not the power. We have many moral religionists, but they also know not the power. We are pestered with conventional, regulation Christians. Oh, yes, no doubt we are Christians; but we are not enthusiasts, fanatics, nor even as this bigot. Such men have a name to live, and are dead. They have a form of godliness, but deny the power of it. I pray you, my hearers, be not content with a truth till you feel the force of it. Do not praise the spiritual food set before you, but eat of it till you know its power to nourish. Do not even talk of Jesus till you know his power to save. God grant that you may know the powers of the world to come for Jesus' sake! Amen.

"BEHOLD HE COMETH."

(From the Indian Missionary.)

BE cometh, the King in his glory returns;
The night has been long, but the day-
star now burns;
He cometh, O, islands and nations afar,
Rejoice, we have seen and have welcomed his star.

Behold on his altar now blazing the flame
That shall purify earth from her sin and her shame;
The new earth afire with the glory divine,
The new starry heaven resplendent shall shine.

He cometh! O clouds that shall shortly be riven
Revealing the brightness and glory of heaven!
O, land of the curse and decay, at thy gates
What splendor, what rapture immortal awaits.

O, Church of the Living, how wondrous shall be
The scene of thy triumph from mountain to sea;
No more the oppressor shall bruise or destroy,
Thy reign shall be endless with naught to annoy.

O, Church of the Living, fear not, He hath said
Where I am ye shall be, then be not afraid;
The seal of his truth on thy forehead is set,

Can the Bridegroom his own and his chosen forget?
O, Church of the Living One, lo, ye shall shine
More bright than the sun is with splendor divine.

WORTH WHILE.

IT is easy enough to be pleasant
When life flows along like a song,
But the man worth while is the one who will smile
When everything goes dead wrong;
For the test of the heart is trouble,
And it always comes with the years,
And the smile that is worth the praises of earth
Is the smile that shines through tears.

It is easy enough to be prudent
When nothing tempts you to stray;
When without or within no voice of sin
Is luring your soul away;
But it's only a negative virtue
Until it is tried by fire,
And the life that is worth the honor of earth
Is the one that resists desire.

By the cynic, the sad, the fallen,
Who had no strength for the strife,
The world's highway is cumbered to-day;
They make up the item of life.
But the virtue that conquers passion,
And the sorrow that hides in a smile,
It is these that are worth the homage of earth,
For we find them but once in a while.

ELLA WHEELER WILCOX.

OCCIDENTAL BUDDHISM.

Rev. George H. Pember Recognizes in Theosophy and the Spread of Buddhism in Western Lands a Sign of the End.

VERY significant have been the phenomena attending and following the rise of Spiritualism in the year 1848, which was a return to the demon-intercourse and wonder-working of ancient times. One of its results we are now witnessing in a revival of Occultism, or the Pagan philosophy. They are but different aspects of the same faith, and will doubtless continue to exist side by side, just as they did in the old Heathen world—Theosophy becoming the creed of the educated and intellectual, while Spiritualism influences the masses of mankind. Spiritualism and Theosophy, which are esoteric and esoteric forms of the same system, are popularizing Buddhism in Christendom.

The hour of Satan's brief triumph is at hand; he is beginning to draw men into confederation by those which were successful in Antediluvian times and at Babel; he is organizing his forces with the intention of raising again the standard of universal rebellion against God and against His Christ. Accordingly, we see both Spiritualists and Theosophists, and even the Agnostics, stretching out the right hand to Buddhism, and procuring favorable consideration for it in Christian lands.

In grouping together those features of the movement which, as we compare them with the ancient predictions of Scripture, almost seem to take bodily shape before our eyes, and, like heralds, to announce the near approach of Antichrist and the close of the Age, we observe that salvation without a Saviour is the characteristic doctrine of the three systems at which we have been glancing; and that this doctrine rests, solely in Theosophy and Buddhism, upon

The Theory of Reincarnations.

We know that—whatever agents may be used, to bring it about—the world will presently be found worshipping the Dragon and the Beast, that is, Satan and the Antichrist (Rev. 3: 4). And the distinctive doctrine of the latter will be the denial of the Father and the Son, which is also a characteristic of Theosophy. That system is willing indeed, to accept the Son as a Mahatma, such as any man may become in the course of ages; but it derides the thought that Jehovah has laid on him the iniquities of us all. It is also fulfilling the prophecy in the First Epistle to Timothy. Men are confessedly receiving instruction from demons; and if we glance at the public specimens of spirit-teachings, we have no difficulty in detecting the lies spoken in hypocrisy. Many are teaching abstinence from flesh; the abolition of marriage, either avowed or virtual, is being unscrupulously preached. And these sins are appearing, as Paul predicted that they would, coincidentally with an apostasy, or falling away, from the great truths respecting the Godhead and incarnation of the Lord Jesus.

An Antediluvian Renewal.

The characteristic features of the days of Noah are reappearing, and, above all, a free communication has been established between the spirits of the air and the human race with a view, apparently, to a sojourn once more of Nephilim upon earth. Unlawful secrets, known in past times only to those few who seem to have acted as Satan's agents in directing the course of this world, are now offered again to men.

All things seem to be prepared for the fulfillment of the solemn prediction in the twelfth chapter of the Apocalypse, when Michael, leading the van of the host which will come with Christ to take the kingdom, shall drive the rebel high ones down to earth. And in the following chapter we see the consequences of that marvelous event: the peoples of Satan's last refuge, of the only remaining portion of his once vast dominions must be organized for the final struggle. And so, out of the troubled sea of anarchy and perplexity of nations, there will arise, in greater majesty and power than it ever before possessed, the resuscitated empire of Rome under the immediate government of the Antichrist.

But of far more intense interest to those who love the Lord Jesus, and long for his appearing, is that which is signified as taking place just previously to the expulsion of the devil and his angels from heaven, namely, the birth and rapture of the Manchild—the completion of the mystic Christ—as manifested by the sudden translation of all waiting saints, whether dead or alive, to meet their Lord in the air.

LOVEST THOU ME?

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Dec. 20. John 22: 15-17; Eph. 3: 17-19.

AN all-important question! On the answer to it depends the eternal destiny of every man who has ever heard the Gospel. If he has heard of what Jesus was and what he did and does not love him, he is outside the kingdom. We speak of faith as the entrance gate; but there can be no true faith without love. Mere intellectual faith—such faith as a man may have in a scientific statement which he has not investigated—does not admit a man to the kingdom. He who believes and trusts to the salvation of his soul cannot help loving. Lovest thou me? It is the test of faith. It is the criterion of transformation—the transformation which theologians call “the new birth.” He who loves Christ is changed unto Christ-likeness. Happy is he who can answer as Peter did, “Lord thou knowest all things; thou knowest that I love thee.”

But there may be a tone of reproach in the question. Peter was evidently pained by it. He had denied his Lord and his conscience must have told him that the doubt which the question implied was not without reason. Thou hast denied me and deserted me, can it be that thou lovest me? May not the same cause for reproach exist now? Is the Christian found acting inconsistently in his business, or seeking amusement and recreation with the world in his leisure? Then Christ may ask, “Lovest thou me?” Are you driving hard bargains; taking advantage of another man's necessities to pay less than the market price; offering him a price for his goods or his services which is below their value knowing that he is so situated that he must accept the offer? Would you be surprised or abashed if Christ put the question, “Lovest thou me? could you do this if you did love me?” Are you to be found in worldly society, in the theatre in the saloon or the club-room, spending the hours left by your business at your own disposal in worldly amusement, in worldly conversation indicating by your presence and words that you are so little changed by your religion that your enjoyment is found in these associations? Then be not surprised if Christ asks you, “Lovest thou me?” There is need that he be assured of the fact, for appearances are against you.

Then the question implies obligation. If you love, you will desire to prove your love. Here is the service in which you can do so. Christ asks nothing for himself. That is like him. But you can feed his lambs. He loves them, and in contributing to their welfare, you are fulfilling his desires. The father, whose son is a stranger in a foreign land, is not likely to forget a service rendered to that son. And if a man who befriends that son is a stranger to him, but a friend of the father, and is befriending him for the sake of the love he bears that father, then the service is doubly acceptable. So the cup of cold water given to a disciple, because he is a disciple, will in no case lose its reward. Who wishes to serve Jesus? Who desires to prove his love? Christ is not here and however earnestly we may desire, we cannot render him personal service. But he has his representatives, duly and formally appointed. Service to them counts as service to him. Do they need temporal comforts? Christ specially mentions them. Do they need spiritual advice and encouragement or teaching? In that sense, too, food may be given. The tree is known by its fruits. If Christ's sheep suffer need, plead for help, and do not receive it, what are we to infer? Can it be that the question has been asked, “Lovest thou me?” and the injunction given, “Feed my sheep,” and that injunction is unheeded!

WORKING TENS.

AMONG the reports sent by circles of King's Daughters to the Silver Cross are some that deserve to be known outside the Order as an encouragement to girls in places where no circles have been organized, to get together and emulate the existing circles. There is no town however small where there are not some poor girls and helpless people who might be helped by their young sisters who somehow seem to possess an intuition and a practical notion of helpfulness which is rare in the sterner sex. A man has seldom any idea of helping another in any other way than by putting his hand in his pocket and handing him a loan or an alms, but a woman without any expenditure of money, or only a very small one, goes to work with exquisite tact and relieves the burden or alleviates the suffering. It is delightful work to engage in and if any of our readers who have not yet tried it will make the experiment, they will be astonished at the good they will get from it as well as the good they may do.

One of the tens reporting its work is that of The Faithful Ten of Hamilton, N. Y. This is a brief summary of results: “We have made clothing and helped re-furnish the homes of two women left destitute by fire; given away bedding; paid rents where homes could not have otherwise been kept; supplied the children of three families regularly with milk; sent a poor baby with a hare lip, to a hospital, where the child's deformity was successfully treated; sent a bright boy, who was rapidly losing his eyesight, to an oculist; now he can see; and a boy seventeen years old, in a New York hospital, who had been for months suffering agony from an injury. His recovery is assured. Two boxes of clothing and other articles have gone to a needy Southern family, and ten dollars to a poor woman in New York, whose husband was killed while heroically saving the life of a child. Wood, coal and provisions and a little money have found their way where needed.”

Another busy circle is The Helping Circle of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., whose Secretary, Miss Mary C. Rupley, writes: “During the summer and winter four quilts were completed and given to poor families; books and other articles were sent to an invalid in Illinois; also fancy articles to the Cripple Home in Philadelphia. Our principal work has been among the needy of our own city. Committees were delegated to visit various families, and during the year five were supplied with provisions and clothing and a sick man with delicacies. The Circle contributed toward a Christmas box sent to Norfolk, Va., by St. Paul's Mission Band and joined the Love-one-another Circle in giving an entertainment, tree and dinner to fifty poor children. It was necessary to almost entirely clothe these children.”

WOMAN'S WORK IN PHILADELPHIA.

A RECORD of busy activity and helpful efforts is contained in the review of the past three months in the Women's Christian Association which is published in Faith and Works. Miss Sarah Cadbury, the corresponding secretary, who compiles the report, writes with evident gratification and helpfulness of the interest manifested by the members and the results already achieved. The boarding-house of the Association has thirty-seven inmates, and the social evenings there and the daily meetings for prayer have been so enjoyable that visitors gladly accept invitations to be present and are eager to repeat their visits. The employment bureau found positions for one hundred and three girls, and in one instance of manifest injustice succeeded in interposing successfully for the protection of the injured girl. Grateful testimonies continue to come in from members of the Association who derived benefit from a summer sojourn at Sea Rest, acknowledging restored health, revived energies and physical and mental recuperation gained from rest amid the sea-breezes. The Whelen Memorial is doing good work among the mill-girls, and evening classes are to be held there during the winter. One instance of good work is mentioned which shows the readiness of the Association to undertake offices outside its prescribed sphere. It was that of a response to a notification received of the arrival of a stranger by an incoming steamer. A member of the Association met the girl at the dock, took care of her during her stay in the city and saw her safely to the proper railroad depot for her journey to her final destination. The ladies of the Philadelphia Association deserve hearty congratulations on this and their other operations for the benefit of their sisters, who need such help more than any of us can fully realize.

A SILVER CONVENTION.

THE Twenty-fifth Convention of the Young Men's Christian Associations of Massachusetts and Rhode Island recently held at Brockton, was marked by a notable manifestation of liberality. The project of erecting a building in Boston for the use of the State Committee was moved and after discussion was approved by the Convention. No sooner did the question of providing the necessary funds arise than six gentlemen present promised a thousand dollars each for the purpose and a number of others made contributions aggregating twenty-four hundred dollars.

The convention was also remarkable in other respects. The number of delegates present was 612 a number altogether unprecedented. Between sixty and seventy of these represented College Associations which are the most gratifying and hopeful of these institutions, representing as they do the culture and education which must influence the future of the nation. The reports read at the convention of the year's work were very encouraging. Nine new organizations had been organized, five women's auxiliaries—ten associations had removed into more commodious quarters and three had become owners of their own buildings which are worth $310,000. Besides this material prosperity, the spiritual results of the year's work as reported give ground for profound thankfulness. The various Associations reported increased interest in the Bible Classes, prayer-meetings and distinctively religious gatherings which had been blessed to the conversion of seven hundred and ninety-five young men who have all made a public profession of faith.

THE EPWORTH LEAGUE IN ACTION.

How earnestly the Epworth League is taking hold of the young people in the M. E. Church surprises even those who entertained the strongest hopes of success at the outset. The following brief notes of recent conventions for which we are indebted to Rev. Jesse S. Gilbert of Midland Park, N. J., show that the movement is spreading in all sections and is making rapid progress:

A Convention has been held of the League in the District of Jeffersonville, Ind. An address of welcome was delivered to which a response was made by Prof. E. E. Outt, President of the League. The Convention opened with devotional exercises. Several interesting papers were presented which deserved much praise. The Convention closed with a joyful consecration service. District President H. L. Van Donn, was present, and made a short address and effected the organization. In Ohio the League is booming. The nineteen Leagues of the Springfield district have held a very interesting Convention at Central Church, Springfield. The presiding elder, Rev. F. G. Mitchell, who is President of the League, occupied the chair. Miss Shaeffer gave the address of welcome, to which Mrs. M. W. C. Hilt made a particularly appropriate response. A series of department conferences were then held. The forty minutes for these soon sped away and the workers assembled in the lecture room for an interesting drawer question. The evening session was conducted by Rev. D. B. Hypes, of South Charleston. The Second Annual Convention of the West Baltimore district League was held at Harlem Park Church, Baltimore, Md.; Rev. J. P. Wright, District President, was chairman. The delegates rendered stirring reports, and no report was more encouraging than the President's. An ample collation was provided by the ladies of the church.

The evening devotional service was conducted by U. C. Ballard. A field committee was appointed whose duty it was to correspond with all the chapters in the district. It was decided also, to hold four quarterly meetings each year.

At the third annual meeting of the Springfield, Mass., district Leagues, ninety-six delegates reported at the morning session. The meeting was held at St. Luke's Chapel, Springfield. Large numbers were present from all the churches in and near the city. The corresponding secretary's report pointed to the growing of the League and showed the district to be in a strong and healthful condition. An excellent programme was provided. Rev. W. S. Fritch presented a very interesting paper on “Young People in Sunday School Work.” Then officers were appointed for the ensuing year.

“Rescue-one” Volunteers.

A GREAT moral movement is in progress at Salem, Mass., following the introduction in that city a few weeks ago of the “Rescue-One” Meetings. The ministers of the place unite in affirming that never in its history has Salem been so thoroughly aroused, spiritually, as since these meetings began under the management of Col. H. H. Hadley. The first meeting was held in the Lafayette Street Methodist Church on the evening of the 18th of November, under the auspices of the W. C. T. U., of Salem. Next, a meeting took place in the South Congregational Church, which was so crowded that for the following meetings, two churches and the Y. M. C. A. Hall were secured, all of which were crowded to the doors every evening during the series. These meetings are still in progress, the Silver Lake Quartette and Col. Hadley's brother, S. H. Hadley, Superintendent of the Old Jerry McAuley Water Street Mission of New York, having been brought on to help the cause. On Sunday, November 22, in the afternoon and evening, three Rescue Men's meetings were held in the largest churches, viz: The Tabernacle, the Universalist and the Central Baptist, with an after meeting from 9 to 10 P. M. at the Y. M. C. A. Hall. More than a thousand persons were turned away, and from fifty to a hundred drinkers knelt for prayer in the hall which was crowded to suffocation.

The interest awakened seems to be deep-seated and genuine, the novel and simple methods of the movement having captured the thinking people. At the beginning a hundred Christians signed the “Rescue-One” pledge, to each cultivate the acquaintance of one drinking person and for one year do all they could by personal effort and kindness to win that person from sin to Christ. Not a word is said at the meetings about creed, temperance or politics. The central idea is that when drinking men are truly converted, they will no longer care to drink, as has been illustrated in so many instances, including the Hadley brothers. Then, since these men will not come to the churches, these “Rescue-One” Volunteers take the gospel of Christ to them by personal efforts directed at one man only, for one year.

The details and incidents of the work are quite interesting and will appear from time to time in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in whose columns the work has already been fully illustrated and described. Among the clergymen in Salem who have taken a specially active part in the work are the Revs. Gideon Cole, J. W. Buckham, DeWitt S. Clark, A. G. Rogers, E. P. Farnham, J. M. Leonard, J. F. Brodie, S. B. Nobbs, G. A. Phinney, Geo. F. Haines, and others.

AN OFFICIAL RAVEN.

A QUAIN instance of literal faith and its fulfillment is related by the correspondent of a European journal. He says that in one of the towns of Holland a poor widow was in dire poverty. It became so extreme that her children cried for the food that she could not give to them. She knelt down and prayed with them. Being questioned by her eldest boy who was about eight years old, as to the use of doing so, she told them that God could send them food, and she took down her Bible and read how Elijah was fed by ravens. “Do you think God would do that again, mother?” The mother said that God could do it and he had certainly promised to answer prayer. “Then,” said the boy, “I will open the door, so the ravens could fly in.” Then the little boy, in simple faith, threw the door wide open, so that the light of their lamp fell on the path outside. Soon afterwards the burgomaster passed by, and, noticing the light, paused, and thinking it very strange, he entered the cottage, and inquired why they left the door open at night. The widow replied, smiling, “My little boy did it, sir, that ravens might fly in to bring bread to my hungry children.” “Indeed,” cried the burgomaster, “then here's a raven, my boy. Come to my home, and you shall see where bread may be had.” So he led the boy along the street to his own house, and then sent him back with food that filled his humble home with joy. After supper, the little boy went to the open door, and looking up he said, “Many thanks, good Lord,” then shut it fast again; for though no birds had come, he knew that God had heard his mother's prayer and sent this help.

Volume XL, of The Christian Herald, containing the numbers for 1888, with complete index, bound in cloth, may be had from this office; price $2.50, including postage. A few volumes of 1884, 1885 and 1887, are also for sale.

THE MOTHER'S PRAYER.

STARTING forth on life's rough way,
Father, guide them;
Oh, we know not what of harm
May betide them;
'Neath the shadow of thy wing,
Father, hide them;
Waking, sleeping, Lord, we pray,
Go beside them.

When in prayer they cry to thee,
Do thou hear them;
From the stain of sin and shame
Do thou clear them;
'Mid the quicksands and the rocks
Do thou steer them;
In temptation, trial, grief,
Be thou near them.

Unto thee we give them up;
Lord, receive them.
In the world we know must be Much to grieve them—
Many striving, oft and strong,
To deceive them;
Trustful in thy hands of love
We must leave them.

UNCLE JOHN'S TALKS.

He Tells About the Druses of Lebanon and Their Singular Dress and Customs.

LOOK at this beautiful picture, children," said Uncle John, as the young curiosity-seekers gathered around him, a few evenings ago. "Can anyone tell me what it means?"

As they gazed in surprise on the portrait of a young girl, attired in Oriental garments and wearing a remarkable head-dress, all confessed their inability to even guess who or what she might be.

"This young lady," explained Uncle John, smiling, "is a Druse of Mount Lebanon. You know, the Druses are tribes of Syria in Asiatic Turkey, who live on the south-east side of Mount Lebanon and the western side of Anti-Lebanon, between Beyrout and Sur. They occupy about a hundred villages and tradition says they are descended from Mohammed Ben Israel Darasi, although they don't all acknowledge him as their founder of their religion. There is also a colony of them in Palestine."

"Who was Darasi?" inquired Tom. "A Mussulman?"

"To tell the real story of their origin," continued Uncle John, "it is necessary to begin a little farther back. When Israel went into captivity the second time (about 700 B. C.), a people lived in some of the wasted strongholds of Samaria who are mentioned in the Bible as Cuthites. The Greeks called them Carduchi. From them sprang the Druses. In the year 686, the Emperor Constantine sent a tribe known as the Mardi, to Lebanon, to keep back the Mohammedan wave of conquest which was then sweeping over the land. Now, the Druses, as we know them, are a combination of Cuthite, Mardi, Arab and Mohammedan, as well as Crusader, some historians say. Mohammed Ben Israel Darasi lived about eight hundred years ago and was a teacher among the Batinites, a people who had come to Egypt from Persia. He entered the service of the Egyptian Caliph, Hakim Biamillah, with whom he became a great favorite. Darasi gave offence to the Egyptians, however, and was compelled to flee, so by Hakim's advice he went to Lebanon and lived there, teaching his doctrines with such success that in ten years all the Arabs there embraced them. He perished in a battle with the Moslems, with whom he was constantly at war. To explain the peculiar doctrines of the Druses would require considerable time and perhaps might not interest you. Many of them respect Christ and abhor Mohammed and Christian missionaries are making progress among them.

"I heard quite lately of a wealthy English lady who bequeathed a considerable sum of money for the establishment of a Christian medical mission on Mount Lebanon and a very worthy Christian woman, Mrs. Meredith, the Superintendent of the Princess Mary Homes, at Addlestone, in Surrey, twenty miles from London, is about to undertake the work. These missions are intended for the healing of the body as well as the soul. Mrs. Meredith, is admirably qualified for mission work, owing to her experience in the Homes, where wayward girls, who have been sentenced to the penitentiary, are transferred during the latter part of their term. The first missionary will find frequently mentioned in the Bible. It is an honorable emblem, besides being worn as a decoration. The married Druse women wear horns of tin or silver, like that in the picture. They are called 'tantours,' and from being at first worn quite small have gradually come to enormous proportions. They were doubtless intended at first for keeping the veil off the face. In the ruder districts some of the horns worn are made of cardboard, or even of common pottery. The extravagant princesses of Lebanon and Hermon even wore horns of gold, studded with jewels, and of such height that the veil had to be spread over them by a servant-maid. It is a strange scene to look at a bevy of horned ladies—their long veils drooping from the head-piece and giving them the aspect of veiled amazons. Few Christians wear them now and many of the Druse ladies have cast them off. The average length of the horn is 18 inches, and many Druse ladies are said to wear them day and night. Most horns are perforated. They are placed over a little padding laid on the head."

"Did any of the other nations ever wear them?" was asked.

"Yes; they appear in ancient sculptures of Ninevite and Arabian origin. Their gods and kings and great warriors were represented with horns. Some of the Scandinavian nations, too, wore them, their warriors believing that the some, brave and industrious people. Their country is well cultivated and they have a growing trade in silk manufactures. Among themselves they are very reliable and truthful; they pray to 'El Ha Kim,' their sacred apostle, as devoutly as do the Moslems to Allah. But they are superstitious and believe in metempsychosis or the transmigration of souls. Their country has a wonderful history—dark, tragic and sorrowful—which some day I may find opportunity to relate to you more fully."

A TREASURE-HOUSE OF DELIGHT.

THE Sabbath cabinet, or Sabbath drawer, writes H. C. Trumbull, in Hints on Child Training, ought to be a treasure-house of delights in every Christian home; not to be opened except on the Lord's day, and sure to bring added enjoyment when it is opened in the children's sight. In that treasure-house there may be bright colored pictures of Bible scenes; Sunday-school papers; books of stories which are suitable and attractive above others for Sabbath reading; dissected maps of Bible lands, or dissected pages of Bible texts, of the Lord's Prayer or of the Apostles' Creed; models of the Tabernacle, or of Noah's Ark and its inmates. Whatever is there, ought resolutely to be kept there at all other times than on the Lord's day. However much the children may long for the contents of that treasure-house, between Sabbath, they ought to find it impossible to have a view of them until that day of days has come around again. The use of these things should be associated inseparably, in the children's minds, with the Lord's day and its privileges, and so should help to make that day a delight as a day of God's choicest gifts to those whom God loves and who love him. By such means the very plays or recreations of the children may be made as truly a means of rest and of worship on the children's part as are the labors of the parents, in the line of Bible study or of Sunday-school teaching, a means of Sabbath rest and of Sabbath worship to them on each recurring Lord's day.

"Speaking Like Angels."

CAN you conceive of an angel grumbling, or snarling or having a voice in any way unpleasant, like that of some people we meet? Of course not; we associate the angelic voice with all that is pure and finely-attuned and delightful to the ear and the heart—soothing, entrancing, inspiring. Remember that your voice whether sad or cheery, complaining or pleasant, is an indicator of your feelings, and often proves contagious to those who hear it. You thus spread cheer and courage, or discontent and despair; you nourish affection or kill it; you communicate the spirit of benevolence or that of selfishness. If you will watch the effects of the various tones you hear in a single day you will no longer doubt this. One man will inspire you with his "Good morning" another will depress you by uttering the same word. One parent will grant a favor so grudgingly that all gratitude is killed, another will refuse it so kindly as to win the child's heart. Life with all its good and evil, its happiness and misery, is largely formed by the emphasis we give it; and you can in no way more surely promote its welfare than by emphasizing and so communicating the best and noblest feelings which stir within you. If you want indeed to be one of God's messengers on earth, you must feel, act and speak "like the angels."

Absent Sons.

ONE of the proudest days in a young man's life is, when attended by the parental blessings, the good wishes of friends and with the brightest hopes, he strikes out in the world for himself. As the days fly past, there may, and doubtless there does come to the heart an occasional reminder of home.

How many thousands of mothers are sorrowing over their absent sons to-day? How many thousand pairs of mother-lips pray, by day and by night that God may guard their boys? "Did you realize when you left home," writes a mother, "all the sorrow it would mean for her who loves you much better than her own life? Do you know that since that June day you have scarcely been out of my mind, and that I have gone over in imagination every day since, a February morning more than fourteen years ago, when they laid a little parcel in my arms and I held you close to my heart with a joy you will never know? It seems to you a proper thing, maybe, to be independent of papa and me and to make your own way in the world. But, oh! you do not know all."

work among the Druses began in 1839, when four noble workers, Drs. Black, Keith, Bonar and McCheyne entered the field, but it was not till 1876 that the value of adding a medical branch to the missions was recognized. Dr. Carslaw was the pioneer medical missionary to the Druses."

"Why does the young girl in the portrait wear that funny-looking head-dress, Uncle?" asked Ted.

"That, my dear, is the 'horn' which you horn added to the fierceness of the countenance. The horn signifies monarchy and you may remember that Daniel in his prophecies frequently mentions horns as signifying kings. David speaks of the horn in many of the Psalms (see Ps. 18: 2; 75: 5; 92: 10), and in 1 Samuel, the kingly horn is referred to (1 Samuel 2: 10.)"

"Are the Druses civilized, Uncle John?"

"To a very great extent they are. They can generally read and write and are a hand-

CHAPTER V. (Continued.)

GIVE us your fist, old fellow! Here goes my cap—to the moon, for aught I care. This is good news, capital news, news fit for the gods, news—almost too good to be true! But it ought to be true, and so true it must be. Let the gods laugh till the skies crack. To see the Romans soundly thrashed and running away with their tails between their legs must have been a treat for heaven and earth. I could give that young man a chapel—who is he?

"Just what everybody is asking."
"And just what, in my opinion, nobody will ever find out; for he must have been at once rapturously spirited off by the celestials to their own country for the good service done us. Perhaps he was a celestial to begin with."

"That reminds me that I did hear some Jews debating whether he might not be the Wonderful Deliverer whom they are expecting."

"Was there any danger that Aleph would be unduly exalted in his own estimation by such a very complimentary account of himself? Perhaps he was saved from this peril by the several large exaggerations of the story. What more natural than for him to say, 'And I, too, am an exaggeration!'"

At any rate, he wasted no time in arguing the matter; for he now noticed that the postern at the side of the great gate was being opened to a comer. So he rose, advanced leisurely to the postern, and plied the knocker which hung from a small window above. The door opened. He told the porter that he wished to see the priest Seti.

"I suppose you mean the high-priest Seti?" said the man with dignity.

"Very possibly," said Aleph. "Is there here more than one priest of that name?"

"I know of no other."

"Then I wish to see the high-priest Seti. Please have him informed that Aleph the Chaldean wishes to see him."

The porter glanced outside, as if to see whether there was any fine equipage, with servants, before the great gateway; then said:

"You probably will not be able to see him this morning. I doubt if he would see the prefect of the city."

"But I am not the prefect—as you have just seen. I am a visitor more likely to be acceptable to the high-priest: for I come by his express invitation. So I will enter and stay in the hall till an answer comes to my message" and he advanced on the man with so decisive and commanding an air that he gave way and admitted him.

"Now if you will send my message at once, you will do no more than your duty," said Aleph, coolly.

So a servant was sent off; who after a few moments returned and, with an air of great respect, said, "The high-priest will see you, I will conduct you to him." But he was spared the trouble, for just then Seti himself appeared, received his visitor in a way that astonished the servants, and conducted him to his own private rooms.

"You see," said the young man with that modesty and deference of manner that are so graceful and winning in the young toward age and station, "that I have very soon availed myself of your permission to call upon you. It is the wish of my father that I should, while in Alexandria, hear for myself the scholars of the west; though the Greek preceptor, who has conducted my education and whom you have seen, has already made me acquainted in a general way with the western literature and learning as it was taught in his youth, both here and at Athens. And, as I am told that the Serapeum stands for a branch of the Alexandrian School, I wish to join it here; and have come to you to learn in what way I may do so, and become entitled to such privileges and immunities as membership confers."

"I am glad that you propose doing this," returned the high-priest; "especially because I have heard from Alexander of the events of yesterday. No doubt there is danger abroad; but if any class among us is specially exempt from espial and interference by the civil and military authorities it is that of the students. So we will have you booked without delay. Where are you now lodged?"

On hearing of the transfer to his own neighborhood, Seti added:

"That is just what I was about to propose. The Romans have less to do with this part of the city than with any other. Neither my son nor myself anticipate any trouble from the authorities on account of what occurred yesterday. They probably will disavow all connection with it, on account of my son's influence at Rome. At the same time they, no doubt, are in full sympathy with the rascals and will let them off without punishment, if not with secret commendation. This everybody is sure of—I mean everybody who knows that the leader in the affair was the son of Flaccus. Your chief danger will be from that reprobate. After the lessons he has had he is not likely to attack you in front; but you will need to be on your guard against all mean and dishonorable ways of attack. He is the greatest scoundrel in Alexandria—after his father and Malus, who have all his vices and hypocrisy in addition. But come, let us lose no time in matriculating."

Seti then led the way to a large hall with a platform and seats.

"This," said he, "is our chief lecture-room; and here some of the professors who live and lecture at the Museum come at stated times to repeat their lectures. This door opens into the tower from the top of which our astronomers observe the stars; and sometimes other things nearer home, as, for example, the flight and pursuit yesterday along the street of Canopus. The doors on the other three sides open into the library with its 500,000 different works on papyrus and parchment. Let us pass into it."

Aleph now found himself in a room, or rather a suite of rooms, lighted wholly from above, whose sides were shining with the copper cylinders which contained the literary treasures of many lands and centuries. What would our modern bibliopoles not give for the same privilege? At central tables and in recesses were scholars poring over open rolls—also professional scribes copying manuscripts with careful exactness and a beauty of result wonderful to see. Seti led his companion freely within the bronze railing that fenced the collection from the general public; taking down and exhibiting some notably rare or beautiful rolls—among others the entire works of Berossus and Manetho and Sanconiaton, of which, unfortunately, we now have only a few fragments.

At length they stopped before a small open office, within which sat a uniformed official. He rose respectfully. Seti asked for the University register.

"Write your name, as you wish it to be known, here," he said, pointing to a page, "and then pay to this man as initiation fee one gold stater. Then when I have written my name as sponsor over against yours on the opposite page, you will be a member of the University and entitled to wear its badge conspicuously on your tunic—also, whenever you please, the University toga. But this latter is usually reserved for special occasions, and can be procured at your leisure."

Aleph followed directions and received a large gold badge, which he was told was only one stater additional. Seti himself fastened it conspicuously on the tunic of the new student. He also received from the registrar a syllabus of the lectures for many weeks at both the Serapeum and Museum. Glancing it over he noticed that Seti was one of the lecturers and Philo another—the one on history and ethical philosophy, the other on Plato and comparative religions.

"Now," said Seti, as they were returning through the lecture-room, "I have hurried you through these formalities for two reasons—one of which is that I wish you to have as soon as possible the benefit of being a recognized member of our University. The other reason is that I wish you to do me a favor. Just before you came I had a message from Rachel, my grand-daughter; that the Greek leech, who is employed for her nurse, has gone back to his old treatment and that the woman is again rapidly sinking. It seems that the husband not merely supports the leech in his course, but absolutely requires it of him. I suspect that the brute wants to get rid of her. Now, I have an important engagement this morning, which will prevent my going personally to look after the case at the time she mentions—I see by this clepsydra* that the time is near—and as the matter is urgent I could wish to have you go in my stead and deal with both the husband and the leech as you may find occasion in order to save the woman's life. Can you do me this favor? I think there is no lecture to-day."

"Certainly," said Aleph, "I will do what I can, for your treatment is that of my own country; though, I confess, I do not at present see how I am to enforce your wishes in case the leech and the husband should both prove obstinate."

"That is a difficulty," returned the Egyptian; "but I must leave you to solve it as you best can. This will be no disadvantage to your education. The young man who has learned how to deal with difficult men in difficult circumstances has graduated at a higher university than teaches in the Serapeum and Museum. So take a lesson in the university of human nature; and, perhaps, when I join you, which will be as soon as my business will allow, you can reproduce the lesson for me."

Aleph could not well help noticing the change that had come over the manners of the porter as Seti and himself approached the postern in close-conversation. The man had exchanged impudence for obsequiousness. He was all deference and humbleness. His bow was so low, as he set the postern wide open, that one might reasonably have feared that the hinge in his back had entirely given way in favor of a prostration. Has it not been noticed in all ages that impudence and servility are near of kin to each other and are never far apart?

In due time Aleph presented himself at the house of the sick woman. The same forbidding looking man who had acted as porter before now answered to his knock, but only opened the door a hand breadth.

After waiting a moment for an invitation to enter, which he did not get, the young man said, "Will you not permit me to enter?"

"What is your business?" demanded the fellow in a surly tone, making the opening of the door still less.

"A friendly one," said Aleph. "I will explain it more fully when I have entered and delivered to you—that is, if you are the husband of the sick woman—some money which I have for you."

The word money seemed to throw a shade of uncertainty into the man's face. At length he said: "I am her husband. Why cannot you deliver the money to me here?"

"Of course I can," said Aleph. "The only difficulty lies in my disposition. The gold is in my pouch, my arm is long enough to reach it, and your hand is near enough to take it: but you see, man, it does not suit my humor to give gold to a man who is rude enough to shut his door in my face. I hardly think you yourself would be liberal under like circumstances—would you?"

"My wife is very sick—it may be dying. Your coming in will disturb her."

"Dying people are not apt to be disturbed by a step and voice as light as mine will be. Besides, if the woman is dying you will need the gold all the more. Death and burial in Alexandria must be expensive. I suppose there are some people here who cannot afford to die."

"Well," said the man, slowly and after a pause, "you can come in; but I cannot let you remain but a few moments."

Aleph promptly stepped in as the door opened; and, while the man was closing and fastening it, made his way to the room he had before visited. As before, the air was close and almost stifling. As before, the woman lay on the bed, in about the same death-like state. And, as before, Rachel sat behind her, supporting her head and caressing it with her hand—her own face a picture of lovely distress. A man at a table was, apparently, preparing some medicines. He was not a bad-looking man, save as a certain pretentious and stubborn look is a bad one on a face somewhat stony and unsympathetic. One would say that his sympathy with his patients would not be likely to interfere with his health or his meals. His whole bearing seemed to say, "I am a leech, and I understand my business;" and yet his dress was too poor to suggest the idea of a prosperous business. All this the observant eye of the young man took in at a glance. Rachel looked up. A look of glad recognition sprang into every feature, but especially into her welcoming eyes. They smiled on him through tears. He bowed profoundly in acknowledgment of the silent greeting; and, advancing to her, said in a low voice, "From your grandfather."

Facing about on the husband, who had closely followed him, he put a piece of gold in his hand, saying as he did so, "For the sick woman."

Then turning to the leech, he said in a courteous tone: "I think I am speaking to the physician in charge of this patient. If so, will he allow me a few words with him in private? Perhaps we can step out into this little court for a few moments"—and he at once quietly moved to the door leading to the back court, opened it, and passed out without looking behind him—passed to the farther side of the inclosure, as if sure of being followed. He was followed, though with some backwardness.

"I wish," said Aleph, as he turned and confronted the leech, "to confer with you about this poor woman. I come from some of her friends. Perhaps you know who these friends are?"

"Is not her husband a friend?"

"He certainly ought to be. As to whether he is, I have my doubts. At all events he is not one of the friends of whom I speak and from whom I come. Do you know who that young lady yonder is?"

"The daughter of Alexander, the great Jewish banker."

"Do you know who Seti is?"

"He is the Egyptian high-priest and primate."

"Well, there are the friends in whose behalf I have come and for whom I speak. They wish to save this woman, and believe it can be done by the treatment which was so successful for the short time it was tried. Will you tell me why it was discontinued?"

"Because it was contrary to all medical rules; but mainly because the man who employs me insisted on a return to the old treatment."

"You mean the husband of the sick woman?"

"Yes."

"Are you sure that your employer is able and disposed to pay you for your services?"

"He evidently is poor; but he says that he has rich friends who can be depended on for all expenses. This seems to be true; for the house has been lavishly supplied for the last few days with every possible comfort by some friends."

"Whom do you suppose these friends to be?"

"The family of Alexander the Alabarch."

"Certainly these are friends worth having," said Aleph with emphasis; "and no doubt they can be depended on to meet all expenses—if they will promise as much. And this they are ready to do, and more, provided you will meet their wishes in certain respects."

"What do they wish?" said the leech after quite a pause.

"That you will take them for employer instead of this vagabond; accept such compensation for your professional services as they are accustomed to pay; and then, in the interest of science, suspend for a little your own way of treating this case in favor of the one you have just abandoned. We will assume all responsibilities. If the experiment does not work well, you can return to the old treatment. You had better have the patronage of the Alabarch and the Egyptian primate than that of this scoundrel—for such he is, unless his looks greatly belie him."

"I have no very high opinion of him, I confess," said the leech. "I have seen more tender husbands than he; and the woman's talk about him in her delirium is far from complimentary. But if we change the treatment he will be troublesome. He was very violent when he discovered the first change."

"Did he tell you by whose authority it was made?"

QUESTIONS & ANSWERS

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Several replies have been received in response to the inquiry of Mrs. M. Hatch, in No. 46 of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD concerning the authorship of the hymn which contains the following verse:

When we've been there ten thousand years
Bright shining like the sun, etc.

J. E. Jewett, Publisher, N. Y., is the first of our correspondents to furnish the information. He writes: "Watts is the author. I take the hymn from The Singing Pilgrim." Murray Bruce, Brooklyn, N. Y., credits it to Wesley. Mrs. H. H. Robinson, Danbury, Conn., writes attributing it to Isaac Watts (1709), in the hymn beginning:

"When I can read my title clear."

Chas. T. Mason, Franklinville, N. Y., writes to the same effect. Charlotte Webb, Flushing, N. Y., refers Mrs. Hatch to the Hymnal Tribute of Praise, where the stanza appears in the hymn "Jerusalem, my happy home," and Mrs. D. Ginter, Muncy, Pa., furnishes the same information. C. H. Gnabett, Wilmot, O., found the stanza in Revival Hymns, in the one beginning: "Jesus my Lord to glory's gone." This leaves the authorship of the particular verse in question still in doubt. Hymn-compilers evidently have found it a most convenient one for purposes of adaptation.

Chas. P. Henderson, Manchester, O. What is the name of the largest Observatory in England?

The Royal Observatory at Greenwich in Kent, about five miles below London.

J. G. Neill, Ogden, Mo. What are the Unpardonable Sins, and where can I find them mentioned in the Bible?

There is but one mentioned in the Scriptures; see Matt. 12: 31, and following verses.

Bert. Rhoads, Columbus, O. 1. When were whiskey and malt liquors first used in America? 2. What denomination is Rev. Lyman Abbott's church?

1. We do not know. 2. Congregational.

E. Jackson, Brunswick, N. J. Is it a sin, or is it forbidden by law, to marry a cousin?

There is no law forbidding such marriages and they occur occasionally; but experience dictates that marriages should not take place within certain bounds of consanguinity or blood-relationship. Descendants of such unions are often physically and mentally degenerate.

D. E. Overmiller, Rinely, York Co., Pa. Please explain Amos 6: 5, predicting woe "to those that chant to the sound of the viol and invent to themselves instruments of music like David?"

The prophecy of Amos was written at a time when the future looked exceedingly dark for Israel, and when, instead of indulging in revelry, every man should have been seriously considering the condition of his country, which was then nearing a great crisis.

Reader, Newport, Marvill, Tenn. 1. To whom does the "him" in Ex. 4: 24 refer? 2. Aaron's rod became a snake when cast down before Pharaoh. By what power did the rods of the magicians of Egypt become snakes?

1. Probably Moses' eldest son. 2. The magicians of the East being experts in sleight-of-hand could readily deceive ordinary observers, particularly in a moment of excitement. One of their feats was to grasp a serpent by a certain part of the body which became rigid under the pressure. It is quite conceivable that, entering a public assembly with rigid snakes that seemed like rods in their hands, and casting them to the ground, the spectators would be deceived.

Lavinia March, Harrisburg, Pa. In what way can obstinacy in children be overcome by a Christian father and mother?

Kindness and firmness, with prayer to God to change the disposition of the child. The will should be trained, rather than broken. The child should not be punished in anger, and mere scolding is valueless. Read Hints on Child Training, by H. Clay Trumbull, published by J. D. Wattles, Philadelphia.

E. O. Gould, Bancroft, Ont., Can. 1. Was Judas Iscariot with Christ and his disciples at the institution of the Supper, or did he receive the sop at the Passover Feast and go out before Christ instituted the ordinance? 2. If he was there, please reconcile the apparent difficulty that arises from the fact that Jesus did not forbid him to partake thereof, and the strict way in which the table is guarded by Paul, 1. Cor. 5: 11; and 1. Cor. 11: 27-30.

1. It is doubtful whether Judas was present at the institution of the Lord's Supper. He was present at the foot-washing and at the early part of the feast, but he could not remain after Christ spoke of his imminent betrayal and showed his knowledge of the identity of the guilty man. Then Judas went out, but we do not know whether the breaking of the bread and the blessing of the cup had already taken place; from Luke's narrative it would appear that they had; Matthew and Mark, however, mention the ceremony after the conversation about the betrayal, which would imply that Judas was not present at the ceremony. The Evangelists were concerned more about the spiritual significance of the events of that agitating night than about presenting those events in consecutive order. 2. Whether Judas partook of the elements or not, we know that since his time many have done so who have afterward, by their conduct, betrayed their Lord for money. Paul's words, to which you refer, are a warning to such men. The responsibility rests with them, not with the man who administers the ordinance.

Of Roxbury, Mass., Says:

Strange cases cured by my Medical Discovery come to me every day. Here is one of Paralysis—Blindness—and the Grip. Now how does my Medical Discovery cure all these? I don't know, unless it takes hold of the Hidden Poison that makes all Humor

VIRGINIA CITY, NEVADA, Sept. 9th, 1891.

Donald Kennedy—Dear Sir: I will state my case to you: About nine years ago I was paralyzed in my left side, and the best doctors gave me no relief for two years, and I was advised to try your Discovery, which did its duty, and in a few months I was restored to health. About four years ago I became blind in my left eye by a spotted cataract. Last March I was taken with La Grippe, and was confined to my bed for three months. At the end of that time, as in the start, then it struck me that your Discovery was the thing for me; so I got a bottle, and before it was half gone I was able to go to my work in the mines. Now in regard to my eyes, as I lost my left eye, and about six months ago my right eye became affected with black spots over the sight as did the left eye—perhaps some twenty of them—but since I have been using your Discovery they all left my right eye but one; and, thank God, the bright light of heaven is once more making its appearance in my left eye. I am wonderfully astonished at it, and thank God and your Medical Discovery.

Yours truly, HANK WHITE.

Two Things In Regard to Catarrh

1st, It is a Constitutional Disease; and 2d, It Requires a Constitutional Remedy.

These two facts are now so well known to the medical fraternity that local applications, like snuffs and inhalants, are regarded as at best likely to give only temporary relief. To effect a permanent cure of catarrh requires a constitutional remedy like Hood's Sarsaparilla, which by purifying the blood, repairing the diseased tissues, and imparting healthy tone to the affected organs, does give thorough and lasting cure.

JESUS' EARLY MANHOOD*

WE assume that the school-education of Jesus must have ceased soon after his return to Nazareth. Jewish home-life, especially in the country, was of the simplest. Only the Sabbath and festivals, whether domestic or public, brought what of the best lay within reach. The same simplicity would prevail in dress and manners. We cannot here discuss the vexed question whether "the brothers and sisters" of Jesus were such in the real sense or step-brothers and sisters, or else cousins, though it seems to us as if the primary meaning of the terms would scarcely have been called in question, but for a theory of false asceticism and an undervaluing of the sanctity of the marriage estate. But whatever the precise relationship between Jesus and these brothers and sisters, it must, on any theory, have been of the closest and exercised its influence upon him.

Passing over Josep or Joseph, of whose history we know next to nothing, we would venture to infer from the Epistle to St. James, that Jesus' religious views had originally been cast in the mould of Shammai. Of his cousin Simon we know that he had belonged to the Nationalist party, since he is expressly so designated. (Zelotes.) Lastly, there are in the Epistle of St. Jude, one undoubted and another probable reference to two of those Apocalyptic books which at that time marked one deeply interesting phase of the Messianic outlook of Israel. We have thus within the narrow circle of Christ's family-life—not to speak of any intercourse with the sons of Zebedee, who probably were also his cousins—the three most hopeful and pure Jewish tendencies brought into constant contact with Jesus: in Pharisaism the teaching of Shammai; then the Nationalistic ideal; and, finally, the hope of a glorious Messianic future.

The Temptation.

A most difficult and solemn question arises: In what respect could Christ Jesus, the Perfect Sinless Man, the Son of God, have been tempted of the devil? . . . Christ's was real, though unfallen human nature, and Christ's human was in inseparable union with his divine nature. He voluntarily took upon himself human nature, with all its weaknesses and infirmities—but without the moral taint of the fall; without sin. It was human nature, in itself capable of sinning, but not having sinned. The position of the first Adam was that of being capable of not sinning, not that of being incapable of sinning. The first Adam would have been 'perfected,' or passed from the capability of not sinning, to the incapability of sinning—by obedience. That obedience—or absolute submission to the will of God—was the grand outstanding characteristic of Christ's work; but it was so because he was not only the unsinning unfallen man, but also the Son of God. To sum up: The Second Adam, morally unfallen, though voluntarily subject to all the conditions of our nature, was with a peccable human nature, absolutely impeccable as being also the Son of God—a peccable nature, yet an Impeccable Person; the God-Man "tempted in regard to all (things) in like manner (as we) without (excepting) sin." The moral purpose—the grand moral purpose in all that was of God—was absolute submission to the will of God . . . He would not yield to Jewish dream; he did not pass from despair to presumption; and lo! after the contest, with no reward as its object, all is his. He would not have Satan's vassals at his legions and all Heaven's hosts are at his command.

The Transfiguration.

What they saw was their Master, while praying, transformed. The 'form of God' shone through the 'form of a servant' the appearance of his face became other, 'it did shine as the sun.' Nay, the whole figure seemed bathed in light, the very garments whiter far than the snow on which the moon shone—"so as no fuller on earth can write them," glittering, 'white as the light.' And more than this they saw and heard. They saw with him two men, whom in their heightened sensitiveness to spiritual phenomena, they could have no difficulty in recognizing, by such of their conversation as they heard, as Moses and Elijah. A strange peculiarity is noticed about Hermon; in a few minutes a thick cap forms over the top of the mountain and as quickly disperses and entirely disappears. Suddenly a cloud passed over the clear brow of the mountain—not an ordinary, but a luminous cloud, a cloud uplift, filled with light. As it laid itself between Jesus and the two Old Testament representatives, it parted and presently enveloped them. Most significant is it, suggestive of the presence of God, revealing yet concealing—a cloud, yet luminous. And this cloud overshadowed the disciples; the shadow of its light fell upon them. A nameless terror seized them. Fain would they have held what seemed to escape their grasp. Such vision had never before been vouchsafed to mortal man as had fallen on their sight; they had heard Heaven's converse; they had tasted Angels' Food, the Bread of His Presence.

The Character of Judas.

Judas was drawn to Jesus as the Jewish Messiah, and he believed in Him as such; but he expected that His would be the success, the result and the triumphs of the Jewish Messiah and he also expected to share in them . . . He had, from such conviction as we have described, joined in the movement at its very commencement. But step by step had come the disappointment. John was beheaded and not avenged; on the contrary, Jesus withdrew Himself. This constant withdrawing, whether from enemies or from success—almost amounting to flight—even when they would have made Him a King—what did it all mean, if not disappointment of those hopes and expectations which had made Judas at the first, a disciple of Jesus? . . . On that spring day, in the restfulness of Bethany, when the Master was taking farewell of friends and disciples, and told them what was to happen only two days later at the Passover, it was all settled in the soul of Judas. Satan "entered it." Christ would be crucified; this was quite certain. In the general cataclysm let Judas at least have something . . . Can there be a store in the Eternal Compassion for the Betrayer of Christ?

A KING'S REGARD FOR THE BIBLE.

A NUMBER of courtiers were gathered one day in the palace of King Edward VI. of England, and one of them desiring to obtain an article which was a little beyond his reach, thoughtlessly took a large Bible from the table, and stepped upon it. The young king, whose piety was most sincere, was deeply grieved at this want of reverence of God's Word. But he loved the offender, and was unwilling to subject him to the mortification of a public rebuke, while he felt that the offence ought to receive attention. He therefore lifted the Bible from the floor with great care, laid it gently on the table, and then stopped over reverently and kissed it. The silent act made a profound impression on the courtiers; and the offender felt the reproof conveyed by the monarch.

AN EXORCISM IN CHINA.

WHETHER demoniacs exist in our day, as they did in the time of Christ, has often been discussed with varying results. Whatever may be the fact, it is certain that in China, Africa, and other non-Christian lands popular belief attributes nearly all cases of aberration of mind to the possession of evil spirits. Missionaries have frequently been entreated to cast them out as Christ and his disciples did. One of these cases was brought to the venerable Dr. Wolff, who thus describes the result:

"We recently visited the little church at Sang Teng, and called upon some of the Christians in their homes. The history connected with the founding of this church is somewhat interesting. Not many years ago, on one of my visits to a neighboring hamlet, where I had a small congregation, a man happened to be present who had recently returned from one of the Dutch settlements in the Straits beyond Singapore. His eldest son had long been deranged in his mind, a lunatic in fact, which was attributed to demoniacal possession by the father and by the neighbors. He had heard, he said, of the power of the missionaries' prayers to expel the demon, and begged me to pray for his son, whom he had brought with him to the church. The young man appeared quite out of his mind and seemed in agonies of terror on seeing me. His appearance was indeed wild; he threw himself on the ground.

I explained to the distressed father that God, the God of the Christians, alone had power to heal men and expel demons; that he heard prayer, that he was the living God, that all I could do was to pray to God for the young man, and this I would gladly do. I then asked all the brethren present to kneel and join in special prayer for this poor demoniac. We all knelt; the young man lay on the floor apparently in great terror, the father knelt by my side. I prayed, if it were God's will, to restore the young man to health and deliver his soul and body from the power of the devil. The sick man then arose and was led to his home in Sang Teng. The following morning the father said his son rose from his bed perfectly sensible and well, and in consequence of this perfect restoration to health, the entire family declared their faith in God, and destroyed their idols and attended the Sunday services. This happened seven or eight years ago, and the young man has never had a return of his lunacy, or any illness since then, though before this for years he was grievously afflicted with this disease, call it what you will. I had the great pleasure of receiving this young man and his father and the entire family into the Church by baptism, and they are now leading exemplary Christian lives."

OFF FOR CHINA.

Miss Katharine M. and Miss Mary E. Talmage, Nieces of the Editor of this Journal, Now on their Way to Missionary Work in China.

AMONG the passengers on the steamer China, which sailed from San Francisco on Thursday last, for the country whose name she bears, were two ladies in whom our readers have a special interest.

They are the nieces of Dr. Talmage, the editor of this journal and they are going to China to labor for Christ in that exceptionally difficult and dangerous field. It is with much pleasure that we publish their portraits this week and ask for them the prayers of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, that God may protect them from harm and bless the effort they are making in his name.

A powerful attraction draws them to this field of missionary labor; for China is the land of their birth. Forty-four years ago, their father, the Rev. John Talmage, then a young man of remarkable promise, bade adieu to his native land, relinquishing the comforts of home and the society of friends and kindred, that he might go to China to preach Christ to its teeming millions of people. He settled at Amoy, a port on the South Eastern coast in the province of Fuh Kien, and devoted himself heart and soul to his work. For nearly half a century, with brief and rare intervals of rest, he toiled there, not only preaching and teaching, but doing valuable literary work in the preparation of lexicons and other educational aids for the benefit of young missionaries studying the language. Six years after his settlement, God blessed the home in that far away land by giving the missionary and his wife a daughter, whom they named Katharine Murray; and two years later—in April, 1855—another daughter was given them, whom they named Mary Elizabeth. These are the two ladies who are now treading in their father's footsteps in Christian labor among the Chinese.

In the year 1861 the girls visited the United States for the first time. They were then respectively six and eight years old. Their journey was taken under circumstances inexpressibly sad. Death had visited the devoted missionary's home in China, and had taken from him his beloved wife. The motherless children were brought here by their bereaved father to be cared for by friends and to gain an education. The missionary saw them settled, made arrangements for their comfort, and then returned as speedily as possible to his sphere of labor. Thirteen long, but busy years passed before they rejoined their father in their Chinese home. In the interval they attended the famous "Old Twelfth Street School," in New York, and subsequently the Normal College. From the latter institution they graduated with honors in 1872. Two years afterward Mr. Talmage took a short respite from his labors to come to America for his children. He found them grown to womanhood, with mental and spiritual qualities fitting them to give him valuable aid in his work.

On their arrival in Amoy both girls entered with ardor into missionary operations. Miss Mary E. Talmage took charge of the girls' school, which had formerly been under the care of Miss Van Doren who was waiting to return to America, and Miss Katharine M.

school prospered. At first, any girls whose parents allowed them to come were admitted, but soon the value of the school was so thoroughly appreciated that parents were willing to make concessions in order to get their daughters admitted to its advantages. Then in the interest of Chinese womanhood, it was stipulated that in order to secure admission a girl must not be subjected to the cruel custom of foot-binding. Only girls whose feet were unbound were received. The test was a severe one, for it meant the abandonment of long-cherished ideals. But it was endured. The parents having to choose between their daughters having the fashionably distorted feet, with ignorance, on the one hand, and the normal feet, with Christian education, on the other, chose the latter and many a poor tortured child must have blessed the teachers for making the stipulation. The school grew in numbers and in popular favor. A picture of the pupils with Miss Talmage in the background, has been reproduced from a photograph, and appears on this page.

At the end of seven years a change of climate became necessary and the Misses Talmage returned to America for a year. The report of their work, which they were able to give, quickened the interest of the churches in the Chinese mission and when in the fall of 1882 they were ready to return, the Board showed its appreciation of their labors by conferring on Miss Katharine Talmage as well as on her sister a regular appointment. Seven more years of earnest, consecrated labor followed. Not only did they work among the people of Amoy, but at regular intervals they took journeys inland, penetrating from thirty to forty and hardships they endure on these journeys we hear nothing, for missionaries are people little given to talking of their own privations, but we may be assured that the journeys are no pleasure trips, except as any labor for Christ is pleasure.

Until the year 1889 they had enjoyed the support and comfort of their father's presence and counsel in their work; but in that year it became evident that immediate cessation from active labor in China and a period of rest in his native land alone could enable the now aged missionary to retain his hold of life. Forty-two years of unremitting work in a debilitating climate had undermined his vigorous frame while leaving his mind eager and active as ever. He returned, and his daughters followed him the next year for their regular vacation. Nearly twelve months they have spent here. But not in resting. The needs of the field they know so well have been a burden on their hearts, and they have willingly travelled hither and thither to attend missionary meetings and explain those needs and tell of the work and its triumphs to Christians at home. Some sixty or more of these meetings they have addressed during their sojourn and now they are on the way back to resume their labors in the land they love for its need's sake and for Christ's sake.

In our country we lay less stress on family traits and traditions than is laid on them in other lands, but even here there are some that we gladly recognize. It must be peculiarly gratifying to the members of the Talmage family to see that the generation which gave to the service of Christ workers so notable as the four brothers, John, James, Goyne and T. De Witt Talmage, is to be succeeded in the next generation, by these two ladies, their two brothers, David M. who is pastor of a church at Westwood, N. J., and George Edwin, who is pastor of a church at Mott Haven, N. Y., and by Frank De Witt, son of the editor of this journal, who is now at Union Theological Seminary, New York, preparing for the ministry.

Talmage, though holding no appointment under the Board, visited the hospitals, called on the Chinese Christians in their homes and in other ways aided her father in his work. Seven years they labored thus in their respective spheres, endearing themselves to the people by gentle, patient, self-denying labor. The miles into districts only partially opened up to missionary labor. These journeys performed partly by boat and partly in native chairs occupy three weeks, during which they do not see a single white person. They have to take their bedding with them and a supply of food to last the whole time. Of the inconveniences

CHEATED INTO SIN.

Dr. Talmage's latest Sunday morning Sermon: "Surely in vain the net is spread in the sight of any bird." Proverbs 1: 17.

EARLY in the morning I went out with a fowler to catch wild pigeons. We hastened through the mountain gorge and into the forest. We spread out the net, and covered up the edges of it as well as we could. We arranged the call-bird, its feet fast, and its wings flapping in invitation to all fowls of heaven to settle down there. We retired into a booth of branches and leaves and waited. After a while, looking out of the door of the booth, we saw a flock of birds in the sky. They came nearer and nearer, and after a while were about to swoop into the net, when suddenly they darted away. Again we waited. After a while we saw another flock of birds. They came nearer and nearer until just at the moment when they were about to swoop they darted away. The fowler was very much disappointed as well as myself. We said to each other, "What is the matter?" and "Why were not these birds caught?" We went out and examined the net, and by a flutter of a branch of a tree part of the net had been conspicuously exposed, and the birds coming very near had seen their peril and darted away. When I saw that, I said to the old fowler, "That reminds me of a passage of Scripture: 'Surely in vain is the net spread in the sight of any bird.'" Now the net in my text stands for temptation.

The call-bird of sin tempts men on from point to point and from branch to branch until they are about to drop into the net. If a man finds out in time that it is the temptation of the devil, or that evil men are attempting to capture his soul for time and for eternity, the man steps back. He says, "I am not to be caught in that way: I see what you are about: surely in vain is the net spread in the sight of any bird."

There are two classes of temptations—the superficial and the subterranean—those above ground, those under ground. If a man could see sin as it is, he would no more embrace it than he would embrace a leper. Sin is a daughter of hell, yet she is garlanded and robed and trinketed. Her voice is a warble. Her cheek is the setting sun. Her forehead is an aurora. She says to men: "Come, walk this path with me; it is thymed and primrosed, and the air is bewitched with the odors of the hanging gardens of heaven; the rivers are rivers of wine, and all you have to do is to drink them up in chalices that sparkle with diamond and amethyst and chrysoprasus. See! It is all bloom and roseate cloud and heaven." Oh! my friends, if for one moment the choiring of all these concerted voices of sin could be hushed, we should see the orchestra of the pit with hot breath blowing through fiery flute, and the skeleton arms on drums of thunder and darkness beating the chorus: "The end thereof is death."

I want to point out the insidious temptations that are assailing more especially our young men. The only kind of nature comparatively free from temptation, so far as I can judge, is the cold, hard, stingy, mean temperament. What would Satan do with such a man if he got him? Satan is not anxious to get a man who, after a while, may dispute with him the realm of everlasting meanness. It is the generous young man, the ardent young man, the warm-hearted young man, the social young man, that is in especial peril. A pirate goes out on the sea, and one bright morning he puts the glass to his eye and looks off, and sees an empty vessel floating from port to port. He says: "Never mind; that's no prize for us." But the same morning he puts the glass to his eye, and he sees a vessel coming from Australia laden with gold, or a vessel from the Indies laden with spices. He says: "That's our prize; bear down on it!" Across that unfortunate ship the grappling-hooks are thrown. The crew are blindfolded and are compelled to walk the plank. It is not the empty vessel, but the laden merchantman that is the temptation to the pirate. And a young man empty of head, empty of heart, empty of life—you want no Young Men's Christian Association to keep him safe; he is safe. He will not gamble unless it is with somebody else's stakes. He will not break the Sabbath unless somebody else pays the horse hire. He will not drink unless some one else treats him. He will hang around the bar hour after hour, waiting for some generous young man to come in. The generous young man comes in and accosts him and says: "Well, will you have a drink with me to-day?" The man, as though it were a sudden thing for him, says: "Well, well, if you insist on it I will—I will."

Too mean to go to perdition unless somebody else pays his expenses? For such young men we will not fight. We would no more contend for them than Tartary and Ethiopia would fight as to who should have the great Sahara Desert; but for those young men who are buoyant and enthusiastic, those who are determined to do something for time and for eternity—for them we will fight, and we now declare everlasting war against all the influences that assail them, and we ask all good men and philanthropists to wheel into line, and all the armies of heaven to bear down upon the foe, and we pray Almighty God that with the thunderbolts of his wrath he will strike down and consume all these influences that are attempting to destroy the young men for whom Christ died.

The first class of temptations that assaults a young man is led on by the sceptic. He will not admit that he is an infidel or atheist. Oh, no! he is a "free-thinker," he is one of your "liberal" men; he is free and easy in religion. Oh! how liberal he is; he is so "liberal" that he will give away his Bible; he is so "liberal" that he will give away the throne of eternal justice; he is so "liberal" that he would be willing to give God out of the universe; he is so "liberal" that he would give up his own soul and the souls of all his friends. Now, what more could you ask in the way of liberality? The victim of this sceptic has probably just come from the country. Through the intervention of friends he has been placed in a shop. On Saturday the sceptic says to him, "Well, what are you going to do to-morrow?" He says, "I am going to church." "Is it possible?" says the sceptic. "Well, I used to do those things; I was brought up, I suppose, as you were, in a religious family, and I believed all those things, but I got over it; the fact is, since I came to town I have read a great deal, and I have found that there are a great many things in the Bible that are ridiculous. Now, for instance, all that about the serpent being cursed to crawl in the garden of Eden because it had tempted our first parents; why, you see how absurd it is; you can tell from the very organization of the serpent that it had to crawl; it crawled before it was cursed just as well as it crawled afterwards; you can tell from its organization that it crawled. Then, all that story about the whale swallowing Jonah, or Jonah swallowing the whale, which was it? It don't make any difference, the thing is absurd; it is ridiculous to suppose that a man could have gone down through the jaws of a sea-monster and yet kept his life; why, his respiration would have been hindered; he would have been digested; the gastric juice would have dissolved the fibrine and coagulated albumen, and Jonah would have been changed from prophet into chyle. Then all that story about the miraculous conception—why, it is perfectly disgraceful. Oh! sir, I believe in the light of nature. This is the nineteenth century. Progress, sir, progress. I don't blame you, but after you have been in town as long as I have, you will think just as I do."

Thousands of young men are going down under that process day by day, and there is only here and there a young man who can endure this artillery of scorn. They are giving up their Bibles. The light of nature! They have the light of nature in China; they have it in Hindostan; they have it in Ceylon. Flowers there, stars there, waters there, winds there; but no civilization, no homes, no happiness. Lancets to cut, and Juggernauts to fall under, and hooks to swing on; but no happiness. I tell you, my young brother, we have to take a religion of some kind. We have to choose between four or five. Shall it be the Koran of the Mohammedan, or the Shaster of the Hindoo, or the Zendavesta of the Persian, or the Confucius writings of the Chinese, or the Holy Scriptures? Take what you will; God helping me, I will take the Bible. Light for all darkness; rock for all foundation; balm for all wounds. A glory that lifts its pillar of fire over the wilderness march. Do not give up your Bibles. If these people scoff at you as though religion and the Bible were fit only for weak-minded people, you just tell them you are not ashamed to be in the company of Burke the statesman, and Raphael the painter, and Thorwaldsen the sculptor, and Mozart the musician, and Blackstone the lawyer, and Bacon the philosopher, and Harvey the physician, and John Milton the poet. Ask them what infidelity has ever done to lift the fourteen hundred millions of the race out of barbarism. Ask them when infidelity ever instituted a sanitary commission; and, before you leave their society once and forever, tell them that they have insulted the memory of your Christian father, and spit upon the death-bed of your mother, and with swine's snout rooted up the grave of your sister who died believing in the Lord Jesus.

Young man, hold on to your Bible. It is the best book you ever owned. It will tell you how to dress, how to bargain, how to walk, how to act, how to live, how to die. Glorious Bible! whether on parchment or paper, in octavo or duodecimo, on the centre table of the drawing-room or in the counting-room of the banker. Glorious Bible! Light to our feet and lamp to our path. Hold on to it!

The second class of insidious temptations that comes upon our young men is led on by the dishonest employer. Every commercial establishment is a school. In nine cases out of ten, the principles of the employer become the principles of the employee. I ask the older merchants to bear me out in these statements. If, when you were just starting in life, in commercial life, you were told that honesty was not marketable, that though you might sell all the goods in the shop, you must not sell your conscience, that while you were to exercise all industry and tact, you were not to sell your conscience—if you were taught that gains gotten by sin were combustible, and at the moment of ignition would be blown on by the breath of God until all the splendid estate would vanish into white ashes scattered in the whirlwind—then that instruction has been to you a precaution and a help ever since. There are hundreds of commercial establishments in our great cities which are educating a class of young men who will be the honor of the land, and there are other establishments which are educating young men to be nothing but sharpers. What chance is there for a young man who was taught in an establishment that it is right to lie, if it is smart, and that a French label is all that is necessary to make a thing French, and that you ought always to be honest when it pays, and that it is wrong to steal unless you do it well? Suppose, now, a young man just starting in life enters a place of that kind where there are ten young men, all drilled in the infamous practices of the establishment. He is ready to be taught. The young man has no theory of commercial ethics. Where is he to get his theory? He will get the theory from his employers. One day he pushes his wit a little beyond what the establishment demands of him, and he fleeces a customer until the clerk is on the verge of being seized by the law. What is done in the establishment? He is not arraigned. The head of the establishment says to him: "Now, be careful; be careful, young man, you might be caught; but really that was splendidly done; you will get along in the world, I warrant you." Then that young man goes up until he becomes head clerk. He has found there is a premium on iniquity.

One morning the employer comes to the establishment. He goes into his counting-room and throws up his hands and shouts: "Why, the safe has been robbed!" What is the matter? Nothing, nothing; only the clerk who has been practicing a good while on customers is practicing a little on the employer. No new principle introduced into that establishment. It is a poor rule that will not work both ways. You must never steal unless you can do it well. He did it well. I am not talking an abstraction; I am talking a terrible and a crushing fact.

Now here is a young man. Look at him to-day. Look at him five years from now, after he has been under trial in such an establishment. Here he stands in the shop to-day, his cheeks ruddy with the breath of the hills. He unrolls the goods on the counter in gentlemanly style. He commends them to the purchaser. He points out all the good points in the fabric. He effects the sale. The goods are wrapped up, and he dismisses the customer with a cheerful "good morning," and the country merchant departs so impressed with the straight-forwardness of that young man that he will come again and again, every spring and every autumn unless interfered with. The young man has been now in that establishment five years. He unrolls the goods on the counter. He says to the customer, "Now those are the best goods we have in our establishment;" they have better on the next shelf. He says: "We are selling these goods less than cost;" they are making twenty per cent. He says: "There is nothing like them in all the city;" there are fifty shops that want to sell the same thing. He says: "Now, that is a durable article, it will wash;" yes, it will wash out. The sale is made, the goods are wrapped up, the country merchant goes off feeling that he has an equivalent for his money, and the sharp clerk goes into the private room of the counting-house, and he says: "Well, I got rid of those goods at last; I really thought we never would sell them; I told him we were selling them less than cost; and he thought he was getting a good bargain; out of it, my son—we will just throw ourselves on him who hath promised to be the God of the widow and the fatherless; he will take care of us." And I tell you no young man ever permanently suffered by such a course of conduct. In Philadelphia, in a drug shop, a young man said to his employer: "I want to please you, really, and I am willing to sell medicines on Sunday; but I can't sell this patent shoe-blackening on Sunday." "Well," said the head man, "you will have to do it, or else you will have to go away." The young man said: "I can't do it; I am willing to sell medicines, but not shoe-blackening." "Well, then, go! Go now." The young man went away. The Lord looked after him. The hundreds of thousands of dollars he won in this world were the smallest part of his fortune. God honored him. By the course he took he saved his soul as well as his fortunes in the future. A man said to his employer: "I can't wash the wagon on Sunday morning; I am willing to wash it on Saturday afternoon; but, sir, you will please excuse me, I can't wash the wagon on Sunday morning." His employer said: "You must wash it; my carriage comes in every Saturday night, and you have got to wash it on Sunday morning." "I can't do it," the man said. They parted. The Lord looked after him, grandly looked after him. He is worth to-day a hundred-fold more than his employer ever was or ever will be, and he saved his soul. Young men, it is safe to do right. There are young men in this house to-day who, under this storm of temptation, are striking deeper and deeper their roots, and spreading out broader their branches. They are Daniels in Babylon, they are Josephs in the Egyptian court, they are Pauls amid the wild beasts of Ephesus. I preach to encourage them. Lay hold of God and be faithful.

"I CAN'T SELL IT ON SUNDAY"

There is a mistake we make about young men. We put them in two classes: the one class is moral, the other is dissolute. The moral are safe. The dissolute cannot be reclaimed. I deny both propositions. The moral are not safe unless they have laid hold of God, and the dissolute may be reclaimed. I suppose there are self-righteous men in this house who feel no need of God, and will not seek after him, and they will go out in the world and they will be tempted, and they will be flung down by misfortune, and they will go down, down, down, until some night you will see them going home hooting, raving, shouting blasphemy—going home to their mother, going home to their sister, going home to the young companion to whom, only a little while ago, in the presence of a brilliant assemblage, flashing lights and orange blossoms, and censers swinging in the air, they promised fidelity and purity, and kindness perpetual. As that man reaches the door, she will open it, not with an out-cry, but she will stagger back from the door as he comes in, and in her look there will be the prophecy of woes that are coming: want that will shiver in need of fire, hunger that will cry in vain for bread, cruelties that will not leave the heart when they have crushed it, but pinch it again, and stab it again, until some night she will open the door of the place where her companion was ruined, and she will fling out her arm from under her ragged shawl and say, with almost omnipotent eloquence, "Give me back my husband! Give me back my protector! Give me back my all! Him of the kind heart and gentle words, and the manly brow—give him back to me!" And then the wretched, obese and filthy, will push back their matted locks, and they will say, "Put her out! Put her out!" Oh! self-righteous man, without God you are in peril. Seek after him to-day. Amid the ten thousand temptations of life there is no safety for a man without God.

But I may be addressing some who have gone astray, and so I assault that other proposition that the dissolute cannot be reclaimed. Perhaps you have only gone a little astray. While I speak are you troubled? Is there a voice within you saying, "What did you do that for? Why did you go there? What did you mean by that?" Is there a memory in your soul that makes you tremble? God only knows all our hearts. Yea, if you have gone so far as to commit iniquities, and have gone through the whole catalogue, I invite you back this hour. The Lord waits for you. "Rejoice! O, young man, in thy youth, and let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth; but know thou that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment." Come home, young man, to your father's God. Come home, young man, to your mother's God. O! I wish that all the batteries of the Gospel could to-day be unlimbered against all those influences which are taking down so many of our young men. I would like to blow a trumpet of warning, and recruit until this whole audience would march out on a crusade against the evils of society. But let none of us be disheartened. O! Christian workers, my heart is high with hope. The dark horizon is blooming into the morning of which prophets spoke, and of which poets have dreamed, and of which painters have sketched. The world's bridal hour advances. The mountains will kiss the morning radiant and effulgent, and all the waves of the sea will become the crystal keys of a great organ, on which the fingers of everlasting joy shall play the grand march of a world redeemed. Instead of the thorn there shall come up the fir tree, and instead of the briar there shall come up the myrtle tree, and the mountains and the hills shall break forth into singing, and all the trees of the wood shall clap their hands!

A BISHOP AS AN ARTIST.

IN the course of a series of most interesting letters from Uganda, Africa, the Church Missionary Gleaner publishes facsimiles of several pencil drawings by Bishop Tucker, of scenery around Lake Victoria Nyanza, one of which we reproduce in this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. In these tropical African wilds, the natural scenery is magnificent beyond description and the Bishop's facile pencil has proved wonderfully apt at transferring it to paper for the delectation and enlightenment of home friends. The Uganda missionaries report a marvelous demand for the Scriptures in the native languages. They are teaching hundreds of young converts to read the Gospels, and the beautiful country bordering on the great lake, which only a few years ago was in heathen darkness, is now one of the brightest and most promising Christian sections of the "Dark Continent."

OFF FOR CHINA.

Shortly before Miss M. E. Talmage returned to China she received a letter from a co-laborer in Amoy relating incidents which had occurred, since her departure, in connection with one of the departments of Christian work in Amoy. This is one of the most pathetic of all the Chinese missionaries' spheres of labor. It is the effort to save from death or slavery the little girls whom Chinese parents of the lower class have been in the habit of killing or selling, in order to save themselves the burden of their support. A few extracts from this letter will show what urgent necessity there is for the work the missionaries are doing to save the babes and to enlighten the parents.

The Babies' Home.

In two days our Baby Home in Amoy will have its birthday. *Just four years ago on September 9th, the first little inmate was received, and although lan-a has been in heaven three summers now, the succession of baby girls has been coming in ever since, until last week the thirty-fifth candidate was admitted. Ten new little girls have joined our number this year. Shall I tell you about them? There names and ages are as follows:

1. Kim-choi—[Gold-Thimble]—11 months.
2. Si—[Hymn]—9 years.
3. Song-ti—[Comfortable]—1 month.
4. Toa-Pu—[Big Riches]—13 years.
5. Kim-lian—[Gold-chain]—1 year.
6. Hi-lian—[Jubilee]—2 months.
7. Soe-Pu—[Little-riches]—6 years.
8. Purity—3 months.
9. Phoa—[Companion]—11 years.
10. Has no name yet as she is only a fortnight old.

Gold-Thimble comes from the village of White-Stone, a low mud flat near the sea. When our school matron, Mrs. Peau, was home last summer holidays, a neighbor ran in to say that a woman next door was strangling her newly-born baby daughter, because she was poor and the child was a girl. Away ran Mrs. Peau to stop her, and said: "Do not kill the child, I will write a letter to the ladies in Amoy and see if they will receive your baby into the home there."

"Oh," said the woman, "Amoy is a long way off, the ladies may not take it, and then what shall I do with a big baby on my hands! It is easier to kill it when it is little." But after a while she was persuaded to keep it. So little "Black-egg," as the neighbors call her, belongs to us; and some American boys and girls send us money for her support.

Big-Riches is a Formosa child. She was a slave girl and was left at the hospital door covered with burns and bruises.

As to Gold-chain, Mrs. Roai, a Bible-woman, was passing through a village one day when she saw a woman busy tying something in a sack. She asked what it was and found out that it was a baby-girl. The woman was the baby's mother, and she was tying her up to throw her into the sea to drown. Mrs. Roai told her of the Home and sent us word, and so we got Gold-chain.

Purity is a funny, bold little lassie. Her father takes opium and would not keep a second daughter, so her mother was carrying her off to pop her through a sort of little box arrangement in the wall of a Chinese Foundling House in Amoy. Fortunately for Purity, a Christian woman told us of her and she escaped the sad life such foundlings have.

Little Riches is a sweet and motherless girl, very delicate. Her father is also an opium smoker and has tried to sell her, but a lady saved the child, and pays us a sum of money monthly towards her expenses.

Companion is a cripple with a bright happy face. She had a bad fall when she was three years old, which has lamed her for life. When her parents discovered that she would never walk, they said they would sell her to the beggars.

We have built a nice new room in the Home this summer, and meantime the children have been staying in the empty girls' school. They were delighted to get back to the "Noah's Ark," as a girl here calls the Home. We hope it will indeed prove an ark of refuge to many poor helpless and friendless children in Amoy.

The total contributions to the cause of foreign missions by the churches of Great Britain last year amounted to $6,507,895.

In Chicago the Congregationalists have eighty-four churches and one-hundred and four teen Sunday schools, fifty churches and seventy-four Sunday schools within the city limits. The aggregate Congregational church membership of the city and suburbs is 11,894

CHURCH AND WORLD.

S. S. Lesson For Dec. 27. By Mrs. M. Baxter
1 John 2: 15-17. Golden Text, Jas. 4: 4.*

THE Church and the world; in the sight of God so distinct, yet made by man to be so indistinguishable! Jesus declares of his Church, his "little flock;" "Ye are not of the world, I have chosen you out of the world." (John 15: 19.) And, in his great prayer, he says twice to the Father: "They are not of the world, even as I am not of the world." (John 17: 14, 16.) In the eyes of God, the world and the Church cannot co-exist: "If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him." Where the world is, there the Church is not, and where the Church is, as God recognizes it, there, most surely, the world is not.

The World Hates Jesus

and hates his people. His brethren who "did not believe on him" taunted him that he did not do something to attract the notice of the world: "If thou do these things, shew thyself to the world." (John 7: 4.) It seemed so plausible, so thoroughly the common-sense thing to do. It seemed such a waste of power and influence to do such miracles and yet remain a nobody. The world likes to make the most of every personal advantage to exalt itself and gain credit among men; and wherever the spirit of the world is, there is the seeking for prominence and power. The most public thing which Jesus ever did on earth was to die upon the cross for sinners! How unlike the world! "My time is not yet come," he answered to his brethren, "but your time is always ready. The world cannot hate you, but me it hateth, because I testify of it that the works thereof are evil." And again, "If ye were of the world, the world would love its own, but because ye are not of the world, but I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you."

What then is the world, whose very existence eats out the life of the Church? What is it which Scripture always speaks of as so antagonistic to the Church of Christ? What is this world of which Paul says, "the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world"? The apostle John answers the question: "All that is in the world, the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life." The Church, like her Master, denies herself, her self life, takes up her cross as he took up his, turns away from the lust of the eyes, "things seen and temporal," and, instead of seeking high things and great things for herself, follows Christ, taking his yoke upon her and learning of him who is meek and lowly in heart.

"Love not the World."

Here is God's plain command, but who obeys it? Love not what pleases you and makes you feel at home down here. Love not what makes you feel important, what makes you admire yourself, or your church, or your Christian work. Love not these things, they are not your "world." What makes the attraction of the theatre to those who attend it? It amuses them, they enjoy it, it gratifies self: it is the lust of the flesh, self indulgence. But if, in your church, you have some performance which is of the same nature, something meant to please the flesh, to amuse, to pass the time away agreeably, are you not doing exactly what your Lord told you not to do; are you not attempting to unite what God has divided? Are you a witness to Christ's denial of self, or to the world's indulgence of self? "But," you say, "we do it with the best of motives—the unconverted need something to attract them, and we hope, in providing them with the amusement which they will seek for somewhere, that we shall succeed eventually in winning them, and so increasing our church. But how will you expect to make satisfactory Christians of your converts when you provide for their self indulgence, help them to consider amusement as a necessity, and then teach them by word what your deeds have denied,—that the follower of Jesus must deny himself, take up his cross and follow Christ? Have you decided in your church to ignore the conditions of discipleship?

"But," you say, "in these days there is so much competition that we could not hold our own unless we made some effort; all the other churches do the same." Is not that the very reason why they who "follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth" should not do so? Is there not a need for some to be true to him amid the prevailing worldliness? Are these fine buildings of Christ or of the world? Do they glorify God or man? Do they bear witness that the Church of Christ is a stranger and a pilgrim here, or do they prove that she has taken root in the world?

Jesus was "despised and rejected of men;" he had "no form nor comeliness, and when we shall see him there is no beauty that we should desire him." His followers were "unlearned and ignorant men." He himself "had not where to lay his head." His early followers would not own earthly possessions, and they were "everywhere spoken against." What a contrast now! Enter any popular church of any denomination,—the lust of the eyes is there in the architecture and the dress of the worshippers, lust of the flesh in the luxurious cushioned pews and artistic music, in the flowery eloquence of the preacher, who evidently thinks more of pleasing his congregation than of pleasing God, and the pride of life is manifest in the way in which the world patronizes such Christians, and in the self satisfaction of the would-be worshippers. The whole atmosphere of the place speaks of the world, and not of God. Where are the men in such a congregation who would "yield their bodies" to Nebuchadnezzar's fiery furnace, to Daniel's den of lions, to fight as Paul did with the wild beasts at Ephesus? Where is the martyr spirit of God's unworldly ones of old, who "were tortured, not accepting deliverance; that they might obtain a better resurrection. And others had trial of cruel mockings and scourgings, yea, moreover, of bonds and imprisonments; they were stoned, they were sawn asunder, were tempted, were slain with the sword; they wandered about in sheepskins and goatskins; being destitute, afflicted, tormented; of whom

The World was not Worthy."

Where is the relation between these self-indulgent members of modern churches and those martyrs of old, stalwart only in their faith, who dared to be unworldly? God can never sanction the union of the world and the church, "Whosoever, therefore, will be a friend of the world, is the enemy of God." (James 4: 4.) It is simply appalling to think that the mass of those who profess to be Christians, and who have a sense of sin forgiven, are nevertheless really living to the world, without the smallest idea of their true vocation! "He that saith he abideth in him ought himself so to walk even as he walked." (1 John 2: 6.) "Christ pleased not himself;" most professing Christians never think of anything else than to please themselves, as to how to spend their time, what profession or trade they will choose, what denomination they wish to belong to, what work of God they wish to be employed in, who shall be their partner in life, etc., they consult themselves, their tastes, feelings, and convenience, about all this. But this is just what the world does too; where is the difference between them and the world? Most members of churches like to get a little credit for their religion, they like to be recognized and patronized, while the Master would not receive honor from men!

Are men aware that the very purpose for which Christ died for us was "that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves; but unto him which died for them and rose again?" Are men blind to the great purpose of God according to which we are called to "be conformed to the image of his Son?" (Rom 8: 28, 29.) What is to become of men who think they believe in God to the saving of their souls, because they believe their sins are forgiven, and in their heads understand that Christ has died for them, and yet know nothing of "the power of an endless life" (Heb. 8: 16), but live under the power of the things of time and sense, just like those who make no profession of conversion? If God has called his true children to be the light of the world and to shine as lights in the world "in the midst of a crooked and perverse nation," (Phil. 2: 15), then what is to become of those whose light is so feeble that nobody knows they are children of light at all, and their dim light so confuses those who are in darkness that they cease to believe there is any true light? "God is not mocked: for what a man soweth, that shall he also reap. He that soweth to his flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption." All the sowing to the world in the churches brings its own harvest of spiritual death and confusion, and we have on every side the pitiable spectacle of the professing Church of Christ going down to Egypt for help (Isa. 21: 1), calling in the world to help in its finances, and thus attempting to join together the world and the church which Christ divides most utterly asunder.

What is to be the End of it?

In the end of this age the Son of Man "shall send forth his angels, and shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend and they which do iniquity, and shall cast them into a furnace of fire; there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth."

But now, to-day, what is to be done? Obey God. "Love not the world;" come out from the world; be courageous in walking alone, misunderstood, unappreciated. Follow Christ, cost what it may, and he will be responsible for the consequences. "He," and only he, "that doeth the will of God abideth forever." (1 John 2: 17.) The last days are upon us; if ever a true witness is to be borne for Christ it must be now, and if those fail the Lord whom he is calling to his help against the mighty, "enlargement and deliverance shall arise from another place." (Esther 4: 14.)

STUART'S FRIENDS.

A Story of the Sunday School Golden Text for Dec. 27. "The friendship of the world is enmity with God." James 4: 4.

OUTSIDE the door of a well-filled library, in a small ante-room, in which many a boy had waited in trepidation for an interview with the President of a great school, a boy of some fourteen years old was nervously moving from one chair to another. He was what was called in the school a new boy; and he was waiting for his first interview with Dr. Wendover. These interviews were not frequent. The boys were in constant contact with the teachers of the various classes and with the chiefs of the houses, but it must be some very extraordinary occasion that brought any of them to the Doctor's private study. It was his rule, however, to make the personal acquaintance of every boy on his entrance to the school and Walter Stuart was waiting for that formality.

"You would like to grow up an intelligent and useful man, would you not?" said the Doctor after the first few words of greeting. "After a few years the world will be in the hands of those who are now boys of your age and leaders will be wanted. They will be chosen from among you on account of their character and their attainments. Would you like to be one of the chosen?"

Walter said he should. "Very well; it depends very much on what is your conduct while you are in this school. There are some who change after their school-days are over, but they are not many. It depends on yourself what the outcome is."

"I shall do my best, Sir," Walter answered. "Then I can give you some advice, that will be more useful to you now than it would be later. You will find in the school, as you will afterward find in the world, that you are brought in contact with those whose minds are depraved, whose faces are steadily set toward evil. If you make them your friends you will inevitably degenerate. You will find other boys in the school who are studious, thoughtful, striving to become better, as well as to know more. Join yourself to them; they will help you. We want you to be a credit to the school. Now, good night. May God be with you."

The boy went out of the Doctor's room feeling more serious and more in earnest than he had ever felt before. He was not long in discovering the truth of the Doctor's words. That very night, at the supper table where he shyly took a vacant place, he heard conversation which proved that some of the boys were very decidedly of the lower type, the Doctor had spoken of. Yet he could not help laughing at some of their remarks. Their merriment was contagious. The Doctor in their opinion was a dry old sermonizer who would take all the fun out of a boy's life if he could. They mimicked his voice and manner and evidently had little respect for him. He and the teachers were regarded as their natural enemies whom it was fair to deceive if a boy was smart enough to do it successfully.

"Don't you take any notice of that Archer's talk," said one of these boys to Stuart a few days later, referring to some remarks made by one of the teachers. "It is quite enough if you get up the lines you will have to construe in class, without doing the whole passage."

"Mr. Archer said that the Doctor expected us to do the whole," said Stuart.

"Oh, the Doctor! He is worse than Archer. If you take notice of what he wants, he will make you just as dry an old pedant as he is himself. Get up your own lines, I'll lend you a translation to help you with them and then come into my room and we'll have some fun."

Stuart's conscience would not let him consent to this, but he promised to join the boys when he had prepared his lesson. But it was difficult. Time was flying and at last he closed his books and ran off to join the other boys. A few minutes over the borrowed translation swept away his difficulties and though he felt mean in using the forbidden book, he was glad of the help it had given him and was ready to join in the games going on. As the days went on, Stuart made more and more use of the translation and though he was not making much progress in knowledge of Latin, he was able to keep up his place in the class. At times he was uneasy at the thought that he was deceiving his teachers, but the boys assured him that the practice was quite legitimate and what every one did.

The examinations were the testing time. The forbidden book could not be used then, and Stuart and his friends failed lamentably. There was no promotion for them, and there was besides that disgrace, sense of having fallen in Dr. Wendover's esteem. He did not conceal the fact in speaking to them. Indeed, so sharp was his reproof that the boys were filled with resentment and became sulky and rebellious. Stuart, however, knew that the Doctor was right and determined, that next term he would study hard and eschew forbidden helps.

Next term showed two parties in the class. New boys had come into the class from the class below. Elated by their promotion, they were eager for study, and were cheerful and docile. The older boys, soured by their disgrace were insubordinate and morose. Every day witnessed some unpleasantness. Stuart was in a continual dilemma. He was studying now as the new boys were but the others looked upon him as one of themselves and expected his allegiance. He continued to associate with the latter in their rooms and join in their games, but studied hard at every opportunity. The trouble continued until the teacher, despairing of doing any good with the class appealed to the Doctor.

"Are all the older boys, alike?" Dr. Wendover asked.

"Stuart is doing his best," was the reply, "but he evidently sympathizes with them."

"Send him to me."

"Stuart," said the Doctor seriously, when the boy presented himself, "I want you to understand your position. These companions of yours will have to be severely punished. I understand you are studying now as you ought but in the class room you are abetting them in their unruly ways and you are still associating with them in the evenings. Now I will tell you frankly that if you wish to escape their punishment you must separate yourself from them. They are opposing the good government of the school, they are disobedient and unruly. I am much displeased with their conduct and I consider your companionship with them an offence on your part. You must decide between them and me. There must be no weakness. Separate yourself from them or you will share in their punishment."

"It is very hard to do, sir."

"Yes, I know, but it will be still harder to bear the punishment."

Stuart went away with downcast face. It was a painful dilemma but it had to be faced. Happily for him he had the moral courage to decide on the right side and when his companions were expelled from the school, Stuart was allowed to remain. In many a night of hard study he sought to make up the ground he had lost by his association with his evil companions.

HELPFUL ANECDOTES

A PRAYER FOR A SICK MAN.

A WORKER connected with the station of the McAll Mission in Paris called the Salle Brooklyn, relates a remarkable incident of a timely prayer. It appears that an elderly French lady was converted at the mission and afterward tried to influence all her relatives and friends. One young man, her nephew, was her special concern. He was careless and sceptical, and laughingly put aside her appeals. He lived out of the city at Fontainebleau, and she could not see him often, but whenever she could see him she pleaded earnestly with him for Christ and she prayed for him morning and night. One day, recently, the thought of this nephew crossed her mind during her daily duties, and she felt impelled to leave her work and plead with God again for his salvation. She obeyed the impulse, and agonizingly besought the blessing for which she had so often asked. She went to Fontainebleau the next day to see her nephew. She was distressed on going to his house to hear that he was dead. He had fallen sick and had rapidly grown worse, and had died the day before. But her sorrow was alleviated by strange news. During his sickness, he had for the first time in his life become concerned about the state of his soul and had sought the forgiveness of God. His anxiety increased, and he could not find peace. But on the previous day, about the time his aunt was led to pray for him, after lying lost in thought for some time, he suddenly exclaimed: "I believe, I believe." Calling the attendant, he bade him send word to his aunt that he had found salvation through Christ and was dying in peace. Soon afterward he died rejoicing in his newly found hope.

A PRECEDENT FOR PRAYER.

DURING the illness of Pastor C. H. Spurgeon, when prayer-meetings were held daily in the Tabernacle to implore the Lord for his recovery, one prayer was made which impressed all who heard it. The member who offered it showed singular confidence and referred to a former instance in which a similar prayer had been heard and answered. His prayer was that God would add to his servant's life as he added to king Hezekiah's life, fifteen years. Being asked afterward to what precedent he referred, he directed their attention to a singular coincidence which he had discovered in the records of the Tabernacle church. A predecessor of Mr. Spurgeon in the pastorate of the church—one Benjamin Keach, whose work entitled Keach on the Metaphors was formerly a widely circulated book—had been very ill. His physicians finally said there was no hope. Several friends and brother ministers surrounded his bed. One of them—the Rev. Hansard Knollys—offered prayer for the apparently dying man. He begged God to recover his beloved brother minister and add unto his days the time granted to Hezekiah. Apparently he received an assurance that his prayer was heard, for, rising from his knees, he said, "Brother Keach, I shall be in heaven before you," and immediately left him. The church records show that Brother Keach did recover and lived just fifteen years afterward. He died in 1804.

A JEWEL'S RESPONSE.

DURING a visit to Messrs. Tiffany's jewelry store, in New York, a clergyman, who describes his visit in Times of Refreshing, says that he noticed among the diamonds and other precious stones which were giving forth rays of lovely light, one stone which seemed absolutely lustreless. It looked little better than a common pebble. Surprised at seeing it in such brilliant company he asked what it was and why it was placed among the jewels. "It has no beauty about it at all," he said. The attendant who was showing the visitors over the store, took up the dull looking stone, put it in the palm of his hand and held it there for a minute or two with his hand closed over it. Then he opened his hand and lo, the stone was shining with the colors of the rainbow. It was dazzling, brighter than its companions. "We call it," said the attendant, "the sympathetic stone; it does not give out its beauty in all its fulness till it has been in contact with human flesh. It belongs to the family of opals." The clergyman looked at it with wonder, and thought of the living stones which adorn the temple of Christ, many of whom seemed very unattractive until they came in contact with some warm-hearted Christian, who led them to the Master by whom they were fitted for a place in his living temple.

... THE MISSIONARY'S DREAM. ...

(Written for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.)

I DREAMED that I built me a castle,
A stately castle and fair;
I filled it with beautiful pictures,
And sculptured marbles rare;
Though a world of sin and sorrow
Was lying all around,
I built high walls about it
To shut out the sight and sound.

And within my strong enclosure
I set fair plants to bloom;
And the splash of a silvery fountain
Filled the air with sweet perfume.
The creeping vines soon covered
With greenness, the gray stone wall;
And over against the fountain
Grew stately lilies tall.

And I built my home with gladness,
Shutting out all woe and pain,
For I heard that the blessed Master
Was coming to earth again;
And I meant to watch for his coming,
In my home so fair to see.
For I thought when he saw its beauty,
He would surely abide with me.

Then I hastened to do his bidding,
Expecting that I should find
Some grand and splendid followers
Who were waiting just behind.
But when I unbarred the portal
And opened wide the gate,
Only a poor old beggar
In his filthy rags did wait.

And none, but the poorest and lowest,
Who lived in the homes around,
Rewarded my eager search—
Nobody else I found [ing;
And coming again to the Master,
I told him about my quest;
But he said in gentle accents,
That "the beggar was his guest."

Into the highways and hedges
He bade me once more go,
And bring to my costly supper
The children of want and woe.
Slowly I went on my errand,
And filled my banquetting place
With the poor, and the sick, and the sinner;
Then glad grew the Master's face.

And he wended his way among them,
As round him pressed the throng;
And comforted, healed, and pardoned
Their sorrow, sickness, and wrong.
And the fare I had provided
As just enough for two,
Was blessed till it fed them fully,
And some left over, too.

When all had gone rejoicing,
I crept to the Master's side,
And said, "Dear Lord and Master,
Wilt thou not with me now abide?"
Then he lovingly gazed upon me,
And said, "I have other sheep
Who know not the voice of their Shepherd,
And strangers my sheep-fold keep."

"I must go—I must seek and find them:
Come with me! come with me, child."
Unquestioningly I followed
As he toiled over mountains wild,
And across the turbulent ocean,
Till we stood in a new, strange land
Where palm-trees waved in beauty
By the silvery river's strand.
Wherever he moved in the darkness
He left a golden track;
And I followed his shining footsteps,
Nor dreamed of turning back.
And I helped him carry his message
And scattered it far and wide,
And found when I worked with the Master
He would ever with me abide.

ONLY A POOR OLD BEGGAR.

But suddenly, while I tended
My beautiful flowers one day,
He came—from whence I knew not—
And I said, "O Master, stay."
But his gaze turned slowly from me,
And he stood so grand and tall
That he saw the want and sorrow
Lying just outside my wall.

"My child, you're not ready for me.
I go, but I come again;"
And the glorious presence vanished—
My work seemed all in vain.
But I builded my wall still higher
That shut in my beautiful home,
And spread him a dainty banquet;
And prayed him again to come.

And then, as before, while I tended
The flowers that were my pride;
He came, in his wondrous beauty,
And stood again by my side.
So glad was I to see him,
I threw myself at his feet:
"O stay with me now, my master!
Abide with me, I entreat!"
"Come! see the dainty banquet
I have spread for thee and me."
And he turned and entered my dwelling
In his kingly majesty.
Then bent his glance upon me:
"I have friends outside the wall,
If I tarry to eat," he answered,
"You must surely invite them all."

"I KNOW THERE'S A FAIRER MANSION."

What became of my stately castle
I never returned to see:
For I know there's a fairer mansion
Awaiting both him and me;
Where the lilies of love are blooming
The River of Life beside,
And there through eternity's ages
With the Master I shall abide.

JAPANESE STUDENTS

VERY affecting are the messages and letters which are continually coming from Japan to Mr. J. McLain Brown who has now returned to America. Many of our readers contributed to his support while he was engaged in Christian labor among the students of the Tokyo University and they will be glad to learn that the fruits of the effort are many and are increasing. One letter which we have seen is from a student who signs himself Ryokichi Osawa. He is now in his third year in the University, "in the class of jurisprudence" and he writes, "I am very busy, but much times as possible are employed for the Lord to lead sinners from the dreadful dark way to the light of Jesus Christ. Several times I give public talkings of Christianity in the streets." He speaks by name of other students who are working for Christ, missing sadly the help Mr. Brown was able to give them, but profoundly thankful that God led his steps to Japan and enabled him to stay there so long. Some of these young men would be glad to give all their time after leaving college to preaching the gospel to their countrymen, but they will have to earn their living by secular employment and give only their leisure to the propagation of the faith. Mr. Brown believes such preaching has better promise of success in Japan than the preaching of foreigners and he is hoping to obtain subscriptions among American Christians by which he will be able to support at least one student who will give the whole of his time to missionary effort.

Mr. Brown is, we regret to learn, making very slow progress toward recovery from the fever which prostrated him. It appears to have been complicated by a species of blood-poisoning, so that in addition to the weakness resulting from the fever, he is suffering from a number of sores which obstinately refuse to heal. At present he is terribly emaciated and is able to get around only by the aid of crutches. His heart still yearns for the hopeful young men he had to leave behind him in Japan but at present there is no prospect of his return. This fact renders him the more anxious to secure funds for the support of a native preacher. Should any of our readers be willing to help him in this effort they may send contributions to Mr. J. McLain Brown, Whiton, Wicomico Co., Maryland.

A HINDOO'S THANKS.

At the last service held by Dr. Geo. F. Pentecost at Poona, a Hindoo gentleman, the Hon. Rao Bahadur Ranade, rose to propose a vote of thanks to him for his labors during the previous two weeks. Mr. Ranade drew an interesting parallel between the Hindus and the Jews, on both of whom Divine experiment was being or had been made. He regarded the Hindus as a chosen people, selected by God to be the agency for accomplishing a great work in the world. As the Jews were subject to various moulding influences—the Egyptians, the Persians, and the Greeks and Romans—so also were the Hindus at the hands of the Aryanistic, Buddhistic and Mohammedan agencies of the development, and now, lastly, Christianity. He said that the Mohammedan influence was necessary to correct the faulty Hindoo conception of the unity of God. Christianity also has its corrective mission, to impart to Hindus that conception of the holiness and majesty of God, which the paternal idea tends to minimize. He paid a glowing tribute to the character and teachings of Jesus Christ, and in the course of his remarks repudiated the idea which seemed to prevail among Europeans, that Hindooism is to any serious extent pantheistic in its practical life and working. While there have been pantheistic thinkers among the Hindoos, its philosophical system is essentially dualistic, not pantheistic. Mr. Ranade closed his eloquent speech by tendering Dr. Pentecost the hearty thanks of the educated community, assuring him that they would fulfill the promise which he had asked of them in one of his lectures—to seriously ponder the truths he had brought before them. They gave him a heartfelt greeting at parting and would always be ready to welcome him should he visit them again. Several other Hindoos spoke, one of whom said that Dr. Pentecost must not be disappointed by the apparent lack of results. The seed had been sown in the minds of some of his hearers and some of it would bear fruit.

A GREAT CHANGE.

MANY a man under the power of religion has had a change take place in his soul and in his life equal to that which took place in the life of a man in Scotland, who for fifteen years had been a drunkard. Coming home late at night, as he touched the doorsill, his wife trembled at his coming. Telling the story afterward, she said, "I didn't dare go to bed lest he violently drag me forth. When he came home there was only about the half inch of the candle left in the socket. When he entered he said: 'Where are the children?' and I said, 'They are upstairs in bed.' He said, 'Go and fetch them,' and I went up and I knelt down and I prayed God to defend me and my children from their cruel father. And then I brought them down. He took up the eldest in his arms and kissed her and said, 'My dear lass, the Lord hath sent thee a father home to-night.' And so he did with the second, and then he took up the third of the children and said, 'My dear boy, the Lord hath sent thee home a father to-night.' And then he took up the babe and said, 'My darling babe, the Lord hath sent thee home a father to-night.' And then he put his arm around me and kissed me, and said, 'My dear lass, the Lord hath sent thee home a husband to-night.' Why, sir, I had na' heard anything like that for fourteen years. And he prayed and he was comforted, and my soul was restored, for I didn't live as I ought to have lived, close to God. My trouble had broken me down." Oh! for such a transformation in many of the homes of this country!

ROYAL MARRIAGES.

THE ocean cable ever and anon announces by the whole columns full the particulars of weddings in some of the royal families of Europe, and we are always interested in reading such cablegrams. But let not our friends across the sea imagine that we have no royal marriages here in this western wilderness. Whenever two hearts come together pledged to make each other happy, binding all their hopes, and fears, and anticipations in one sheaf, calling on God to bless and angels to witness, though no organ may sound the wedding march, and no bells may chime, and no Dean of Westminster may pronounce the ceremony—that is a Royal Marriage. When two young people start out on life together with nothing but a determination to succeed, avoiding the invasion of each other's idiosyncracies, not carrying the candle near the gunpowder, sympathetic with each others employment, willing to live on small means till they get large facilities, paying as they go, taking life here as a discipline, with four eyes watching its perils, and with four hands fighting its battles—whatever others may say or do—that is a Royal Marriage! It is so set down in the heavenly archives, and the orange blossoms shall wither on neither side the grave.

We deplore the fact that, because of the fearful extravagances of modern society, many of our best people conclude that they cannot possibly afford to marry. We are getting a fearful crop of old bachelors. They swarm around us. They go through life lop-sided. Half-dressed, they sit round cold mornings, all a-shiver, sewing on buttons, and darning socks, and then go down to a long boarding-house table which is bounded on the north and south and east and west by the great Sahara Desert. We do not pity them at all. Why do they not set up a plain home of their own and come into the Ark, two and two. The supporting of a wife is looked upon as a great horror. Why, dear friends, with right and healthy notions of time and eternity, it is very easy to support a wife if she be of the kind worth supporting. If she be educated into false notions of refinement and have "Young Ladies' Institutes" piled on her head till she be imbecile, you will never be able to support her. Everything depends on whether you take for your wife a woman or a doll-baby. Our opinion is that three-fourths of the successful men of the day owe much of their prosperity to the wife's help. The load of life is so heavy, it takes a team of two to draw it. The ship not only wants a captain, but a first mate. Society to-day, trans-atlantic and cis-atlantic, very much needs more Royal Marriages.

HOME LIFE.

THERE is nothing but the old-fashioned religion that will take a woman through the trials of home life. At first, there may be a romance or a novelty that will do for a substitute. The marriage-hour has just passed, and the perplexities of the household are more than atoned by the joy of being together, and by the fact that when it is late they do not have to discuss the question as to whether it is time to go! The mishaps of the household, instead of being a matter of anxiety and reprehension, are a matter of merriment—the loaf of bread turned into a geological specimen; the slushy custards; the jaundiced or measly biscuits. It is a very bright sunlight that falls on the cutlery and the mantel ornaments of a new home. But after a while the romance is all gone, and then there is something to be prepared for the table that the book called "Cookery Taught in Twelve Lessons" will not teach. The recipe for making it is not a handful of this, a cup of that, and a spoonful of something else. It is not something sweetened with ordinary condiments, or flavored with ordinary flavors, or baked in ordinary ovens. It is the loaf of domestic happiness, and all the ingredients come down from heaven and the fruits are plucked from the tree of life, and it is sweetened with the new wine of the kingdom, and it is baked in the oven of home trial. Solomon wrote out of his own experience. He had a wretched home. A man cannot be happy with two wives, much less six hundred; and he says, writing out of his own experience: "Better is a dinner of herbs where love is than a stalled ox and hatred therewith."

PURE AND IMPURE ART.

HOW Paul must have felt when, standing amid those impurities that stared on him from the walls and the pavements and the bazaars of Corinth, he preached of the pure and holy Jesus. The art of the world is still on the side of superstition and death. But that is being changed now. The Christian artist goes over to Rome, looks at the pictures, and brings back to his American studio much of the honors of those old masters. The Christian minister goes over to Venice, looks at "the crucifixion of Christ," and comes back to his American pulpit to talk as never before of the sufferings of the Saviour. The private tourist goes to Rome and looks at Raphael's picture of the Last Judgment. The tears start, and he goes back to his room in the hotel, and prays God for preparation for the day, when

Shivering like a parched scroll

The flaming heavens together roll.

Our Sunday-school newspapers and walls are adorned with pictures of Joseph in the court, Daniel in the den, Shadrach in the fire, Paul in the shipwreck, Christ on the Cross. O that we might, in our families, think more of the power of Christian pictures! One little sketch of Samuel kneeling in prayer, will mean more to your children than twenty sermons on devotion.

BRIEF NOTES.

The Publisher of this journal is profoundly gratified with the response already made to the offer of the premium of the Oxford Teacher's Bible. From all the States and Territories of the Union applications have come in in numbers unprecedented for this incomparable book. No less gratifying are the letters from subscribers who have received it and who express in unmeasured terms their delight with it, after examining it, and discovering what a treasure they have obtained. Students of the Bible who have studied for years over obscure passages have found the long sought light in its "helps." Teachers and workers are especially pleased with it because of the concordance it contains, which enables them to turn instantly to any desired verse. Already over 40,000 of these Bibles have been sent out. It is with sincere thankfulness that the publisher reflects on the good that may result from this large number of copies of God's Word thus distributed. Our readers will be glad to learn that arrangements have been made to continue the offer at least to the end of the present month. Subscribers who desire to secure a copy of the Oxford Teacher's Bible for themselves may do so by sending to the Publisher of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD one new subscription at $1.50 and 50 cents extra, together with a statement to the effect that they themselves intend to renew their own subscription when due.

The American Bible Society will have an exhibit at the The World's Fair, at Chicago, as well as a distribution of Bibles and portions. Preliminary arrangements for this object were made at the meeting of the Board of Managers on December 3d.

Rev. George L. Barker has been holding successful services at Naugatuck, Conn., in the Methodist Episcopal Church, of which Rev. E. O. Tree is pastor. Prof. Isaac H. Meredith has had charge of the Musical part of the exercises. Much good has been done.

The Protestant Episcopal City Mission Society of New York celebrated its sixtieth anniversary in the Church of the Heavenly Rest on Nov. 29. Bishop Potter preached and made an earnest appeal for funds which are sorely needed for the work of the mission.

Rev. Charles A. Berry, was invited to succeed the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher in the pastorate of Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, has been on a preaching tour in Australia. He has been prostrated by an attack of rheumatic fever from which he is slowly recovering.

The Classon Avenue Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, where Dr. Patton, President of Princeton University, has been preaching at intervals for a year past, has called to the pastorate Rev. Joseph D. Burrell, of Clinton, Iowa. Mr. Burrell has accepted the call, and preached at his new church on December 6.

Rev. C. H. Yatman's meetings at Williamsport, Pa., have stirred the whole neighborhood. They commenced in the last week of November with two meetings every night—one in Mulberry Street Church and the other in the Second Presbyterian Church. Both were crowded. The first Sunday, Mr. Yatman began his day's work with a service in the county jail. Later he spoke at the Baptist Sunday School. Then a men's mass meeting in the Pine Street Church, at which over two thousand men were present. This was followed by a service in the Lutheran Church in South Williamsport; later by another in the Second Presbyterian Church. In the after-meeting at the latter place over forty professed conversion.

HOW TO GET PEACE.

FOR many a long year I was a troubled, tempest-tossed Christian. It made me cross very often, and lost me my testimony with a large number. I said it was not right, and there ought to be a remedy somewhere in the mighty gifts of God to men. I found it.

I found Romans to be the book of Doctrines; and I needed to be sound in doctrine, well rooted and grounded, so as not to be driven about with every wind of temptation, or notion of men, or feelings of my own, so I began to read that wonderful book. I gave a year to it; oh! what a year! I found after the twelve months of study, I had just wet my ankles in a boundless ocean, but I found enough to settle me and bring peace.

At once I began to formulate what I had gleaned, and out of it all I found Seventeen Settled Facts. You will find them written down on a fly leaf of my Bible, and I live by them. They are settled facts: not fancies. Settled in my mind just as much as that we look for sunrise in the east, or that my name is C. H. Yatman. I'm sure I never worry over these; I know they are true: the first, because I have seen it: the last, because my mother said so, and that settles it for me; other people may doubt these, but I, never. So with these seventeen settled facts: for me, they are settled and settled forever.

Here they are, and before them I write—I believe in

1. The divinity of Jesus Christ,
2. The inspiration of Scripture,
3. The Triune Godhead,
4. The immortality of the soul,
5. The universal need of salvation,
6. The atonement of Christ for all,
7. The Forgiveness of Sins,
8. The new Birth, or Regeneration,
9. Salvation by faith only, in Jesus Christ,
10. The Resurrection of the dead,
11. The day of judgment for every one,
12. The reward of the righteous in Heaven,
13. The punishment of the wicked in Hell,
14. The Guidance of the Holy Ghost,
15. The Efficacy of Prayer,
16. The Church of Christ,
17. My own Conversion.

Let one believe those thoroughly, and a world of fire won't frighten him.

Some Bible Studies in "Seven."

The Seven Great Doctrines: Sin, Repentance, Faith, Redemption, Justification, Regeneration and Sanctification.

The Seven Great Revelations: God, Life, Immortality, Resurrection, Judgment, Heaven and Hell.

The Seven Great Bible Events: Creation, Fall, Sinai, Bethlehem, Calvary, Ascension and Pentecost.

The Seven Great Books of the Bible: Deuteronomy, Psalms, Isaiah, John, Acts, Romans and Revelation.

The Seven Great Men of the Old Testament: Abraham, Jacob, Moses, Joshua, David, Elijah, and Daniel.

The Seven Great Chapters in the Old Testament: Genesis 1, Exodus 20, Deut. 28, Psalms 91, Proverbs 3, Isaiah 53 and Joel 2.

The Seven Great Chapters in the New Testament: Matt. 5, Luke 24, John 14, Romans 8, II Cor. 13, Ephesians 3 and Revelation 21.

The Seven Great Psalms: 23, 32, 37, 46, 91, 103 and 119.

The Seven Great Women of the Bible: Miriam, Ruth, Esther, Dorcas, Mary, Lydia and Mary Magdalene.

Scripture for the "Can't Hold Outs."

Oh, how people stumble at this, just as though Christ can save, but cannot keep. It is ours to hold on, not hold out. Why will you climb mountains before you reach them, or cross ditches before they are even in sight. Is the God of Daniel dead? Has the "Mighty to Save" and "Strong to Deliver" been shorn of his strength? Nay, nay. He is yet able to make Hebrews 7: 25 true, and the One hundred and twenty-first Psalm a verity to millions. Take the following: Jude 24; John 10: 28, 29; Romans 8: 38, 39; Deuteronomy 31: 6; and Isaiah 41: 10; 43: 1, 2.

Volume XI., of The Christian Herald, containing the numbers for 1888, with complete index, bound in cloth, may be had from this office; price $2.50, including postage. A few volumes of 1884, 1885 and 1887, are also for sale.

RECORD OF THE WEEK.

The Speakership and the New Congress—China's Rebellion Quelled—Death of Ex-Emperor Dom Pedro—A Week of disasters—The Attack on Mr. Sage—General Notes.

AFTER a year of exile following his deposition from the throne of Brazil, Dom Pedro II, died of diabetes in Paris last week. His father was of Bourbon and Braganza and his mother was Leopoldine Carolina Josephine of Austria. He was born in 1825 at Rio de Janeiro, and became Emperor on the abdication of his father, in 1831, although he was not of age until 1840. In 1843 he married Princess Theresa Christina Maria, sister of King Francis of Naples and two princes and two princesses were the result of the union. The boys died young. Dom Pedro was in no sense a leader or a statesman and seemed to prefer the role of a private citizen to that of ruler. The most important events of his reign were the war against Paraguay in 1870-75, ending in the conquest by Brazil of 1000 miles of the enemy's territory, the abolition of slavery by a law passed in 1871 securing gradual emancipation, and the revolution which ended in his retirement from the throne and the establishment of the republic. He annually gave away $400,000 of his allowance in aid of various schemes, philanthropic and otherwise. In 1880 an attempt was made to assassinate him and this was followed, six months later, by a rising in Rio Janeiro, where the royal palace was surrounded by an insurgent army, while an officer read a manifesto proclaiming the Republic. Dom Pedro vainly tried to form a new Ministry and restore peace, but Gen. da Fonseca, who had been chosen Chief of the Provisional Government, demanded that he and his family should leave the country and within twenty-four hours the Emperor and his immediate household were on the ocean en route for Europe.

The Speakership Contest.

AFTER a very sharp struggle, the contest for Speaker of the House of Representatives in the Fifty-second Congress reached a climax in the nomination by the Democrats of Hon. Charles Frederick Crisp. Balloting had continued two days and it was not until 30 ballots had been taken that Mr. Crisp's nomination was made possible by the withdrawal of Mr. McMillin, the other candidates being Messrs. Mills and Springer.

Crisp 119, Mills 105, Springer 4. The Republican members of the House met and, without any special contest, nominated Hon. Thomas Reed of Maine as their candidate for Speaker by acclamation. Mr. Crisp, whose portrait is given in this column, was born in Sheffield, England, in 1845. His parents were professional actors. Coming to this country in childhood, he was educated in the common schools of Georgia, and served in the army from 1861 to 1865, after which he studied law, was admitted to the Georgian bar and after filling various judicial offices with credit, was elected to Congress for the Third Georgia District. He has since been re-elected six times in succession. He is an able debater and parliamentarian.

Postmaster-Gen'l Wanamaker's Report.

In his annual report to Congress, just completed, the Postmaster-General makes some interesting recommendations. Among these are the insurance of registered mail matter, the establishment of a Dead-Letter Office in San Francisco, a Civil Pension List for the support of the dependents of killed and maimed postal clerks, and the serious consideration of the tubular post system, with a view to its introduction in large cities. He hopes for universal free mail delivery, suggests the practicability of consolidating the telephone and telegraph systems of the country with the postal system, recommends post-office saving banks, suggests the consolidation of third and fourth-class postage and declares that the "parcels post," which is now unprofitable, could be made self-sustaining, if its scope were enlarged. He announces that the lottery business has been practically driven out of the mails. 6,800,000 pieces of dead letter matter were handled during the year. 30,000 dead letters contained money aggregating $40,000; 3,000 others contained commercial paper valued at $1,800,000, and 41,000 letters contained photographs, of which 30,500 were restored.

Chinese Rebels Defeated.

CHINA has succeeded in stemming the tide of rebellion which, spreading from Manchuria and Mongolia, threatened to cross the Great Wall and attack Peking. The government troops, under Brigadier-General Nich, commanding in the Kin-chow district, administered a crushing blow to the insurgents, killing their leader and six hundred men, while another government officer at Jehu won a similar victory. At the same time, the revolt in Niuchang was suppressed and the rebels dispersed. Many of the insurgent prisoners have been beheaded. Details continue to be received of the outrages committed by the rebels before the final engagements. It is reported that they murdered a Mongolian prince, and that more villages have been sacked and looted, and the native Christians and white residents massacred. It is asserted that England and China have formed an alliance against Russia. This statement is partly borne out by the refusal of England to join France in compelling China to suppress the demonstrations against Europeans in that country. The present Emperor is of Tartar descent, and the aim of the revolutionists is said to be the restoration of the pure Chinese dynasty and the extinction of the Tartar influence. A portrait of the Emperor is given above. Most writers upon China agree that the government is weak and inefficient and that its collapse is only a question of time. Its unprogressive character has disgusted intelligent Chinese and the innumerable intrigues, jealousies and ambitions of the Court have interfered with and disturbed the highest interests of the Empire.

The New Congress.

CONGRESS assembled on the 7th inst., the opening session in the Senate being a brief one. The desks of the new Senators were heaped with flowers. The new Senators and the old ones who are commencing new terms were sworn in in parties of four. The House was unable to organize until the following day owing to the Speakership, still being unsettled by the Democratic caucus. President Harrison sent in his annual message to both houses at noon Wednesday. The annual reports of the Secretary of the Treasury and the heads of the other departments were also submitted. United States Treasurer Nebeck's report shows that the revenue for the year was $392,612,447.31, or 10,000,000 less than in 1890. The expenditures were $355,372,684.74 an increase of $57,000,000 over last year. The bonded debt was reduced $116,000,000. There were $1,495,666,083 in circulation on June 30.

An Interesting Experiment.

A SURGEON in Philadelphia recently performed an operation on the skull of an idiot boy, three years old, in the hope of restoring the child's mental faculties. The boy had been idiotic from birth. He was unable to speak a word and could only bawl and cry like a new-born infant. He could not move about and his head was no larger than an average coconut. Investigation showed that the bones of the skull had hardened prematurely, preventing the natural development of the head and consequently of the brain. The very delicate operation of linear craniotomy was performed, six inches of the bone of the skull, half an inch wide, being taken from the head, extending back from the forehead. The depressed bones were then raised and the small brain covered with iodoform gauze. There is much interest in the medical profession concerning the result of this strange experiment.

A Week of Disasters.

THE week just ended has been marked by many disasters by sea and land. A furious but short-lived gale swept the Eastern coasts doing considerable damage to shipping. At Haverstraw on the Hudson, N. Y., twelve canal boats laden with brick were sunk and several men are believed to have been drowned.—Much damage was done to telegraph wires, buildings and property generally in Pennsylvania, Virginia and Connecticut.—A blizzard raged in Minnesota, North and South Dakota and Winnipeg, and great wind and rainstorms swept the Wyoming Valley.—Nine workmen were killed and a number injured by the falling of the western wall of the burned Shepard building at St. Paul, Minn., while the men were engaged in removing the debris after the fire.—Three men were killed, half a dozen injured and the coaches of two passenger trains wrecked by a collision on the New York and New England Railroads, at East Thompson, R. I. Two freight trains came together and a moment later, an express dashed into the wreck which was quickly followed by another passenger train, making four trains simultaneously heaped together.—The schooner, William H. Bradley, while off Cape Charles, was struck by a tidal wave and foundered with all on board, except the captain, who clung to the wheel house and was rescued by a Spanish trading vessel.—Three men were killed and seventeen injured by a collision between a gravel train and an express on the Reading Railroad, near Pennington, N. J.

The Attack on Mr. Russell Sage.

RUSSELL SAGE, the millionaire broker, whose life was attempted by a bomb-throwing crank recently, and who received painful but not dangerous injuries in the explosion which wrecked his office, killed a clerk and decapitated the perpetrator of the outrage, has about recovered from the shock his nervous system sustained. Police investigation has discovered that the bomb-thrower was an Anarchist and the member of a society of dynamiters, but whether his real name was H. D. Wilson or not is still uncertain. There is little doubt that the man belonged to a class of cranks whose threats and monetary epistles make the lives of some wealthy people very irksome indeed. Threatening letters such as those the dynamiter sent to Mr. Sage are frequently received by other millionaires, the writers being generally monomaniacs, laboring under delusions as to great wealth or imaginary wrongs. For days after the explosion in Mr. Sage's offices in the Arcade Building, 71 Broadway, crowds of morbid curiosity-seekers visited the morgue to view the severed head of the dynamiter. It was that of a man about thirty-five years old, with small, wavy beard and moustache, and hair pompadour. Inquiries came by wire from different parts of the country from persons and officials who believed they knew the man, but none of them furnished a reliable clue to his identity. Only one arrest has thus far been made,—that of a man named W. D. Southworth, who is thought to have been an intimate acquaintance of the dead dynamiter. Southworth is the leader of a secret society of whose organization and object very little is yet known. A portrait of Mr. Sage is given above. For many years he has been a leader in Wall Street. From a poor grocer-lad in Troy, he had by his indomitable energy and active talent risen to eminence in the financial world.

He is moreover a staunch upholder of the Church and a man of wide charities.

How our Fighting Cruiser Looks.

TWENTY-FIVE thousand people saw the fine new warship New York plunge gracefully from the ways into the Delaware from Cramp's shipyard near Philadelphia last week—the biggest vessel by 1,500 tons ever launched in this country. Last week's

OUR NEW WARSHIP.

CHISTIAN HERALD gave a brief description of this magnificent vessel, which ranks as the queen of our navy. Miss Helen C. Page, a daughter of Mr. J. Seaver Page of New York, performed the christening ceremony as the cruiser swept down to the river on whose breast she rocked gracefully while the crowds on deck and the multitude on shore cheered their loudest. Three hundred and fifty workmen armed with sledges and timbers drove the wedges that started the ship. The contract price of the New York was $2,985,000 and she is one of four sister ships similar in build, armament and cost. The launch and the attendant display cost $30,000. In his annual report, Secretary Tracy of the Navy Department, declares that the new cruisers have no equals among the large cruisers of the world. During the coming year, two more great battle ships, another cruiser like the New York, and several smaller war vessels are to be completed.

NEWS NOTES.

Earthquake shocks continue to be felt throughout Japan. Our arrangements for reciprocity with the West Indies are progressing very promisingly. An explosion of firedamp in a coal mine at St. Etienne, France, caused the death of eighty miners. Heavy snows have fallen in the Northwest. In North Dakota, the drifts are fully fifteen feet high. The great express companies are arranging to use armored express cars, in view of the numerous robberies. Much of the rioting and killing of native Christians in China has been done by two secret societies named Tsinthan and Tsaili. The Mikado of Japan proposes to erect a permanent building on the World's Fair grounds with a typical Japanese garden. Three children were suffocated and their parents burned to a crisp by a tenement fire in the rooms over the grocery store of George Reis, Orleans Street, Detroit. The manner in which the aged and once noted Indian chief, Sitting Bull, met his death, has just come to light. He was shot dead by Red Tomahawk of the Indian Police, a year ago.

The Pacific Mail Steamship Nicaragua, struck on a reef off the coast of San Salvador, and was wrecked. She will be a total loss. She cost about $220,000. All on board were saved. Chili seems disposed to offer no reparation for the Charleston outrage. The investigation is now closed, but no communication as to its result has yet been made to our government.

English and American investors have formed a syndicate for the purchase of the great iron interests represented by the Cooper-Hewitt Company, in New Jersey and Pennsylvania. $5,000,000 is named as the price.

Another riotous outbreak took place at Limerick, Ireland, last week, when a crowd of Parnellites collided with a body of McCarthyites in the railway depot. The McCarthyites drove the others before them with staves.

The Brazilian province of Rio Grande do Sul continues hostile to the new Government. This, together with the antagonism existing between Church and State renders the success of President Peixotto's administration exceedingly problematical.

Muley Hassan, the Sultan of Morocco, has deposed his Khalifa or leading Cabinet officer, a man of enormous influence and wealth, and has taken away all his powers and his fortune as well. The Sultan is said to have discovered that the Khalifa was at the head of a plot to kill him and place his brother on the throne.

Minneapolis has started a movement for the relief of the starving Russian peasants. It is proposed to send out a cargo of flour, by the middle of next January, consisting of from 30,000 to 40,000 barrels, worth from $100,000 to $125,000. Minneapolis millers will give twenty-five carloads.

ALIVE.

"The righteousness of thy testimonies is everlasting: give me understanding, and I shall live."—Psalm 119:144.

YESTERDAY afternoon I was the subject of a somewhat singular circumstance. An esteemed friend and relative came over to my house, evidently laboring under great disturbance of mind, and having inquiries to make of a very important order. He had seen a gentleman who had informed him that it was generally rumored that I had been taken ill with heart disease and had died in a very short time. It was clear I was not dead, and the great fear was removed. The question was put, "Would you like to see him?" But my kind friend was perfectly satisfied, and was too full of joy to wish to linger; he would go back and answer with certainty the many inquiries which continued to be made at the Tabernacle. How the report originated I am quite at a loss to tell. It has evoked much kindness, but it is rather odd to feel called upon to assure your friends that you are yet alive; I can but show myself and ask my friends to see for themselves if I look like a dead man.

Spiritually Alive.

By this incident I was led to turn a heart-glance upon myself, and to say, "I wonder whether there is any question as to whether I am alive in the higher sense?" That I am alive as to my natural life is clear enough; but is my spiritual life equally evidenced? The inquiry came home to my own heart, and therefore I suggest it to yours, for it may profit you. Brethren, do you live unto God? Are you walking as those who are alive from the dead? Remember, my sisters, that it is written, "She that liveth in pleasure is dead while she liveth;" may no woman here come under that condemnation! Brethren, I call upon you also to remember the word of the Lord Jesus to the church of Sardis, "I know thy works, that thou hast a name that thou livest, and art dead." Many exist upon the face of the earth, but into "life" they have never entered.

My subject is life, may the Lord of life help me to speak of it after a lively manner. A consideration of the text will help in the inquiry as to whether we live unto God or no; and it may further help those who sigh after the divine life to discover the way of divine quickening.

A Simple Prayer.

I. First let us consider this prayer in its simplicity. We ask you to notice, first, that this is a suitable prayer for the awakened sinner. He discovers himself to be guilty, and he perceives that there is a punishment for sin, and so far he understands his position. Alarmed by his conscience, he thinks he sees the Judge upon the great white throne about to pronounce the final sentence, and he knows what it must be, for it is written, "The soul that sinneth, it shall die;" so far he understands well enough. He hears, also, that there is life, life in Christ Jesus, life for the guilty; but his mind is much confused with many terrors, and with the horrible dread of the sure consequences of his sin. He has sufficient faith in the revelation of God to know that there is life in a look at the Crucified One; but he does not quite understand what that look means. Then is his time to pray, "Give me understanding, and I shall live."

Equally applicable, however, will this be in the case of one who is a Christian, and who is struggling against temptation. Perhaps, my brother, you are placed in a position where from without by the world, and possibly you may fear that you will not be able to survive it. It comes with such force that you are staggered by its power; you feel that you cannot bear up under such pressure, you despair of your spiritual life. Well, then, ask God to bring home his word to your hearts, that you may act wisely, and may meet the rebuke of the ungodly and the temptations of the wicked prudently, baffling the adversary by your sacred vigilance. Pray, "Give me understanding, and I shall live," for a clear understanding is needful for your preservation from the enemy.

Do you not think that this prayer will often well up from the heart of the suffering believer? To some of our dear brothers and sisters life is one long pang, for bodily disease has fixed its fangs in their flesh. There are others whose life is always from hand to mouth, and sometimes bread is scant in the cupboard, so that grinding poverty breaks them to dust. These are sore ills, as those know who have to bear them. Some, too, are subject to domestic trials, watching daily the pining away of one they love; or bereavement has followed bereavement till they seem left alone in the land. Dear ones, who have been in these ways, have you not cried out at times, "I shall never be able to bear it; I shall die of a broken heart under these great afflictions. O that I might hide me in the grave!" You fear that you will perish if the pressure continues; but you will do no such thing. God will help you to bear your burden by sustaining your soul with heavenly meat that others know nothing of. If the load be not made lighter, the shoulders shall be made stronger, and this shall be done by your having a clearer understanding of the word of God, and a fuller experience of its supporting power. Breathe then, the prayer—"Give me understanding, and I shall live."

I thank God that a large number now present are not so much sufferers as workers. Now, I know that you who are working for God and trying to win souls often feel as if you were not half alive. I am compelled to make such a confession personally. I want to get alive to the utmost; not only having life, but having it "more abundantly." I have some life in me, thank God; but I want it to quicken me more completely. Sometimes we get into a sleepy state, and then the spirit chides us, and we cry, "This will never do."

We Need Quickening,

brethren; do you not feel that it is so? I believe that those who are most earnest are the very persons who blame themselves the most for the want of earnestness. Here, then, is our prayer, "Give me understanding, and I shall live."

Is not this a very proper and blessed prayer for aspiring minds in the Church of God, of whom I trust there are many present? Such men are not satisfied with themselves, but press forward to that which is yet beyond and above them. They have not reached that imaginary climax which some prattle of, who dote upon their fancied perfectness; but their motto is "Onward, Upward, Heavenward." These dwell on high, but their cry is "Higher, higher." They are calm and happy, but yet they sigh for a still serener frame, they have power in prayer, but they long for more of a wrestling spirit, and for greater prevalence with God. If there be anywhere who are fired with such divine ambitions, what better prayer can they use than this, "Give me understanding, and I shall live?"

Life in Death.

Last of all, when we shall not be so much aspiring saints as expiring saints—when we come to lie upon our last bed, and to look into the unseen, then may we still pray after the same fashion. When the eye shall begin to open to the light of heaven, and things but darkly seen before grow clearer in the dawn of the eternal day; when the songs of angels begin to break upon the opening ears of the soul, and heaven is drawing near, for grace is ripening into glory, and glory is coming to welcome its heir—then may we pray to live through the understanding and experience of the divine word. How blessed it will be to have such an understanding of divine realities that we shall stay ourselves upon the promises, shall rejoice in the everlasting covenant, and derive strong consolation from the oath of God. How blessed, then, to understand our living union with our risen Lord, and to know the experience of the happy psalmist when he sang, "Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil; for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me."

Thus, I think I have shown you that this prayer sounds well on every note of the scale. You may sound it out of the depths of seeking penitence, and you may run up to the very highest note with the expectancy of glory, and the word will sound well on any note you touch. From the wicket-gate of humble faith up to the gate of pearl which admits into the golden city you may go on praying, "Give me understanding, and I shall live."

II. The time is come when under our second division the prayer is to be more fully opened up. "Give me understanding, and I shall live." Here is because it is deeply felt; the suppliant owns his need of understanding. Has that want been felt by you, my brother? We are all fools till God gives us understanding. A sense of our own folly is the door-step of all wisdom. He that is taught of God is the man that asks to be taught of God, and she who has chosen the good part is the woman who sits at Jesus' feet to hear his words. It is the mark of a wise man that he does not think himself so, and that he continues to pray "Give me understanding."

Next, the prayer is directed to God, for God alone can give understanding. Teachers can enlighten an understanding which already exists, but they cannot give one. Masters and instructors can profit nothing till we have an understanding with which to receive knowledge aright. All real understanding of the word of God must come to us as it did to the disciples on the road to Emmaus, of whom it is written, "Then opened he their understanding, that they might understand the Scriptures." The author of the sacred volume must himself expound it to the heart and understanding, or we shall be rather blinded by its light than made to see thereby.

Brethren, the Psalmist speaks of understanding in a general way—"Give me understanding"—as if he wanted the faculty for use in many directions. In every transaction of this life we need to be prudent, for we are surrounded by a thousand snares and pitfalls, and if we do not exercise discretion we shall be taken all unawares and become the prey of our enemies. We bear within our own natures so much to confuse and confound and entangle that if we are not taught prudence and understanding we shall certainly never escape from the mischief that is within us. We are frequently who cannot be sure where they are. It happened but the other day near Milan that so dense a fog covered the railway that a number of workmen who were employed upon the line heard the sound of an approaching freight train and rushed to get away from it; but at that very same moment an express train, which they had not heard or seen, came rushing upon them, and cut them to pieces. Such is our condition at times; we try to get away from one temptation and we fall into another; we hope to escape one form of evil and we rush into another. Haste breeds heedlessness, and warmth of zeal is apt to beget indiscretion, so that we daily need a good share of understanding as a ballast to our sail. A Christian man should be a sensible man, a man with all his wits about him. He needs to possess the wisdom of the Book of Proverbs as well as the devotion of the Psalms and the rapture of Solomon's Song. Those books are placed together in the Bible as if to show that they ought to be read together, and that their spirit and influence are essential to a complete practical character.

Like Men in a Fog,

Still, while the understanding sought for in the prayer is evidently of a general character, the former portion of the verse links it with

of the word of God; and oh, beloved, we need above all things to understand what God has revealed. Take care first that you know it. Search the Scriptures, let them be the man of your right hand. Knowing and believing, it will be time to advance to meditation. Consider the words of God; weigh them, test them, dive into them. The richest ore lies deepest. There may be sands of gold sparkling upon the surface of the Bible, but the great nuggets are reserved for those who dig deep both by day and by night. Consider well the words of eternal life, and then go on to obey their teaching. You will never have an understanding of the Word unless you practice it. To this must be added experience, for who understands the word till he has experienced its truth and power? But what a blessed knowledge of a promise you receive when it is fulfilled to you! How you understand the reality of prayer when you have received an answer. How you know the meaning of communion with Christ when your face shines with seeing him!

What Life Means.

Permit me now to say that no man who is at all awakened can really live unless he knows the word of God and understands its inner meaning. For this reason: Do you call it life to live without light? You may have been in the sepulchral dungeons of Venice, where not a ray of light ever came to the unhappy prisoner. To linger there, do you call that life? To live without the light of God is just such an existence. We have heard of men who have been immured in dungeons for forty years, wearing constantly the manacles, never breathing the fresh air,—do you call that life? Can there be "life" where there is no liberty? Alas, some men have never been free, but have remained captives to their lusts, never knowing the liberty wherewith Christ makes them free. Call you such bondage life? But more, many men exist without peace, driven to and fro like a sere leaf by the tempest. Never resting, they are as a rolling thing before the whirlwind. Call you that life? "There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked." Is that life? And then to have no grand object, no object worthy of yourself—to be living in this world merely to get enough bread and cheese to eat, just keeping yourself breathing and your family breathing—is that life? No heavenly object, no ambition worthy of an immortal spirit, do you call that life? Death before you, which you dare not think of! No hope, unless it be the ghastly figment of annihilation! Dreadful hope! To me a thought most horrible! To live without hope is not life; far rather call it death. Lord give me understanding of thy everlasting testimonies, then I shall live, but I shall never live till thou dost grant me this boon.

III. Now we will take the third step and go deeper, laying bare the argument of this prayer.

What Does he Mean

by saying, "The righteousness of thy testimonies is everlasting: give me understanding, and I shall live?" I think he means this—that the word of God when it is practically and experimentally understood by the mind is a pledge of life. Do you think that God would take one of us to be his child and teach us his word, and then after all permit us to be condemned to die? Is that his fashion? Did you ever hear of a judge who instructed a criminal in the arts and sciences laboriously for years with the view of executing him when the task was done? Nothing of the sort. If the Lord has taught you it is because the Lord has bought you, and he will not lose the purchase of his blood. If the Lord has taught you it is because he means to take you where your education will be completed, to take you home to dwell with himself above. "Give me understanding and I shall live:" I am quite clear about that.

The Crown of Life.

Once more, the understanding of God's word is the very flower and crown and glory of true life. When a man so understands God's word as to experience it, and to practice it, he has reached a high point of spiritual culture, and his life will be loaded, like Aaron's rod, with buds and blossoms and fruit unto God's glory. He will be such a man that he shall only need to take one step and be in heaven. He is a shock of corn fully ripe, each single stalk bowing its head towards the earth as if it asked to be ingathered. Let us pray God to give us an understanding of his blessed word, for then we shall be ripe for glory, and in the highest sense it will be true that we shall "live."

I cannot make out the notion of certain professing Christians, that a change comes over Christianity as the ages move on; that there is a Christianity for the first century, and a revised Christianity for the present era. We have become very enlightened of late! You are aware that this is the marvellous nineteenth century. We have invented the electric light, and none can deny that we are the most enlightened people that ever lived on the face of the earth! It is not, of course, pride on our part to say so, for we are very modest. Among us there are men who are wonderfully brilliant—Paul was but a farthing candle compared with them. They understand by so much of these things that it is an honor to speak with them. The gospel that was preached to the poor, which childlike persons understood by the enlightening influence of the Holy Spirit, is in their eyes a very poor business. They sneer and turn up their cultured noses at what they call "the simple gospel," as if a simple gospel was meant for simpletons. Well, now, to my mind, this is the very bliss and blessedness of the gospel, that the righteousness of God's testimonies is everlasting, that though it has been tried by criticism and tested by experience, it remains the same in its spotless purity and in its divine infallibility to this day.

Do you want a better gospel, any of you? Go and fish for it, if you do, but not in the waters of truth. Do you want any nobler promise, any surer covenant? As for me, I bless God that the righteousness of his testimonies is everlasting, and by them I mean to abide all my days, God helping me.

WHO WILL GO.

(For The Christian Herald.)

O'er the ruthless rolling ocean
Where the prince of darkness reigns,
Holding fast his countless victims
Crushed beneath his cruel chains;
Oh the wail of bitter anguish,
Oh the deep, despairing cry:
Send us light or we must perish—
Send it quickly, or we die.

To these wretched, starving millions
Who the bread of life will bear?
At a throne of grace and mercy
Who will plead with them in prayer?
Who will undertake the journey
O'er the stormy billows' foam?
Leaving all without a murmur—
Parents, friends, and native home.

Firmly, bravely, comes the answer
From a loyal mission band,
That our blessed Lord is keeping
In the hollow of his hand.
Firmly, bravely, comes the answer;
Even now I hear him say,
Gracious Master thou hast called,
And thy message I obey.

Dearest brother, you are going,
Where you oft may sow in tears,
And the fruit of earnest labor
Be withheld perhaps for years.
Though you toil amid their changes,
Burning sun and chilling frost,
Not a seed will be forgotten
Nor a single blade be lost;
God is faithful to his promise
If you still in him abide,

You shall reap a golden harvest
And your sheaves be multiplied.

God be with you on the billow,
God protect you o'er the main;
In his tender, loving kindness,
Bring you back to us again.
But if otherwise determined,
And on earth we meet no more;
May we all sing hallelujah
On the bright eternal shore.

—FANNY J. CROSBY.

LINGER NOT.

THE time is short!

If thou wouldst work for God it must be now;
If thou wouldst win the garland for thy brow;
Redeem the time.

Shake off earth's sloth!

Go forth with staff in hand while yet 'tis day;
Set out with girdled loins upon the way;
Up! linger not!

Fold not thy hands!

What has the pilgrim of the cross and crown
To do with luxury or couch of down?
On, pilgrim, on!

With his reward

He comes; he tarries not; his day is near;
When men least look for him will he be here;
Prepare for him!

Let not the flood

Sweep thy firm feet from the eternal rock;
Face calmly, solemnly, the billows shock;
Fear not the storm. —BONAR.

THE EXPECTATION.

BY EMILY S. HOLT.*

We are told that at the time of the First Advent, there was throughout the civilized world a general expectation of a coming deliverer or benefactor. On all sides men were looking out for a Coming Man. There was a widespread, instinctive belief that something was about to happen, and a prevalent impression that this something would take the form of a person.

So, before the Second Advent, we are forewarned that there will be a similar general anticipation of something about to happen. But in this case, it will not be a person who is expected. It will be the shadow of a coming judgment. In the former out-look there was no fear, but a common hope. In the latter expectation there will be no hope, but only

A Universal Fear.

Moreover, we are also told a singular paradox—that alongside with this fear exists the most complete apathy. "Eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage," buying, selling, planting, building—all these things are to be busily going on at the same moment with this prevalent terror.

But there is one class exempt alike from the folly and the fear. They are not exempt from the expectation; nay, they are the most vividly expectant of all; but they are free from the apprehension which makes it terrible—they are watching in undismayed peace, and even with joy. They look up, and lift up their heads, for their redemption draweth nigh. It is not for it they wait, but for him. What engrosses their thoughts is not the coming judgment, but the coming Judge, who to them will not come as the Judge, but as the Saviour. We have here, then,

Three Classes of Men

portrayed: those who are looking out with fear, those who are looking out with joy, and those who are not looking out at all, and on whom the Advent will come as a thief in the night, as a bolt out of the blue. Do we see nothing like this in the present day? As for the apathetic class, their existence is nothing new—they have been always with us. But has there not been to some extent a revival of the second class, and an altogether new development of the first? Until about fifty years ago, the coming of the Lord was not the special hope of the church. So far from its being a usual subject of preaching, it was looked upon as visionary, speculative, impractical—something that theoretically existed in the remote future, but was certainly not to be expected now, and for which therefore it was waste of time and thought to make preparation. But some fifty years since, there was a wonderful upheaval on this question. The Church began to realize the reality and the possible nearness of the Advent, as she had not realized it for centuries. There was much preaching and writing on the subject, and it must be admitted that along with the revival of solemn truths, some foolish fancies were aired. Satan might be trusted to take care of that. Of late years we have heard much less on this point. The froth has died down; but the truth remains with us, and the sure hope is fixed in the heart of the Church. She is still on the outlook, though with calmer mien than of old—no whit less certain, but less feverish and excited. She may be less ready than at one time to measure swords as to minor details, to dispute warmly over possibilities of interpretation; but she is no less assured of the hope itself, no less only more earnest to be found watching, having gathered in her sheaves. The next predicted event is the sign of the Son of Man in heaven. What will it be? Do the words imply some visible, probably unprecedented, mark set in the skies? or is it that the appearance of the Lord himself is the "sign" of his coming? We know not. We only know that he is coming, and he is at hand. Blessed are those servants whom he shall find watching!

Ready for the Midnight Cry,

But some may say, Have not many ere now supposed that the last time had arrived, and found themselves disappointed? Undoubtedly. But the time must come when the hope will not be quenched in disappointment; and how can we know that it is not now? Can we ever be too ready for the midnight cry, too eager to welcome the returning Master?

AN EFFORT FOR PONTUS.

PITY for an oppressed and miserable people has brought into contact with the Christian public of Switzerland, France, and England, the lady whose portrait appears in this column. She is the wife of Garabed Thoumain, a native of Marsovan, in Asia Minor, a town situated in the district which in the New Testament is called Pontus. Madame Thoumain, is a native of Switzerland, a daughter of Pastor Rossier de Visme. A few years ago there came to Lausanne, where she was then living, a young Armenian who wanted to become a student in the Protestant College. He had been taken by some monks of Lebanon from the village school at Marsovan as a boy of remarkable intelligence, who would pay for educating. Their estimate of him was justified by results. The boy learned quickly, but his intellect was so acute that he became convinced of the errors of their teaching. He declared himself a Protestant and made his way to Lausanne to obtain a Protestant education. At the close of his college course he was solemnly set apart for Gospel work in his own land and returned thither to preach and teach. But the young missionary had a strong tie attracting him back to Switzerland, in the person of the daughter of the Huguenot pastor. He returned and married her and she accompanied him to Armenia to help him in his labors.

Such scenes as this delicate Swiss lady witnessed in that land shocked and appalled her. The people seemed to have learned the vices of their tyrants, the Turks. Cruelty, neglect of the sick, the aged and infirm, poverty, squalor, vice, dirt,—she could look nowhere without being sickened by the sight. Her husband was working energetically in conjunction with the American missionaries to found the Christian College for the benefit of intelligent converts which is now an accomplished fact.

But this was for the better class of the people. Mme. Thoumain's concern was for the very poor. She had visited the poor in her father's parish in Switzerland, but such poverty and misery as she saw around her new home she had never even imagined. She saw the sick left in open sheds to live or die as might happen. One of them, an orphan child, had been left in a shed near her home and she had him carried into her house and tried, but vainly, to nurse him back to life. Her heart sank as she saw this and other scenes too shocking to describe, and she resolved to make an effort to relieve some of this misery.

She left her home and started on a tour through Europe describing the condition of the people and appealing to the Christian public for help. Her desire is to build and equip a missionary hospital in which the sick poor may receive help for body and soul. It is gratifying to learn that she has already collected sufficient money to purchase the site and erect a substantial building. A medical missionary holding a first class diploma has volunteered to fill the first place on the medical staff and all that now remains for her to do before her return is to raise a further sum of money for the furnishing and support of the institution. This will probably be accom-

THE ANTE-ROOM.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Dec. 27. Preparation for the Week of Prayer. Isa. 62: 10; 1 Thess. 5: 17; Eph. 6: 18.

WHEN the disciples approached Christ with the request, Lord teach us to pray, they gave utterance to a desire which at some time or other must have been present in the mind of every thoughtful man. He who looks around on nature, who knows anything of its infinite beauty, of the laws which govern it, from the motions of the stars to the construction of an ant's body, who has struggled to form a slight conception of what the Being must be from whom all this has come, would not think of addressing such a Being thoughtlessly or in a mechanical or perfunctory manner. The infinite distance existing between the Creator and the creature he cannot forget; and when to this is added the consciousness of sin, the idea of entering that Presence fills him with awe. Yet, all there is of good in his soul prompts him to approach God and he wants to know how he should enter his presence. Christ's first words settle that question for him, authoritatively. "Our Father." The words give the key to man's relation to the Deity. Weak, disobedient, refractory sons are we, but he is our Father and we may address him so. But, lest the idea should beget familiarity or irreverence, Christ's second sentence is, "Hallowed be thy name." It is thus, then, that we are to come to God with whatever we may desire to say to him—as a Father whose name and relation is inconceivably sacred.

In this, the last week of the year, on the verge of the period when by a common consent all Christendom unites in special supplication, it is well that there be preparation for this sublime function—the most sublime in the capacity of man.

"What profit shall we have if we pray unto him?" asks the sceptic. The idea is the natural product of the utilitarian mind. Benefit for ourselves—will there be any of that? Any exercise, any effort, any expenditure of time or thought which has in it no distinct promise of profit does not commend itself to minds of that type and they are very numerous. If the universe is governed by an unchangeable law, will our prayers have any effect? If God knows the things we have need of before we ask him, will not those things be granted without our asking? If we pray only, "Thy will be done," will not his will be done whether we utter the desire or not? What profit then shall we have if we pray unto him? Such questions are asked every day. They exclude the idea of duty. He would be an unnatural son who never approached his father but when he wanted something of him. The questions exclude the idea of love. He who loves does not wait for the need of a favor before seeking the presence of the one he loves. The sense of gratitude is also excluded. We have much to thank God for and we should be shamelessly ungrateful if we were silent before him. Therefore, if there were no promise of profit in praying to him, we ought to pray. But there is promise. There is reflex benefit in the exercise itself.

When one, who holds communion with the skies, Has filled his urn where those pure waters rise, And once more mingles with us meaner things, 'Tis even as if an angel shook his wings; Immortal fragrance fills the circuit wide, That tells us whence his treasures are supplied.

Communion elevates if it be communion with a higher intelligence and how must it be with communion with the highest! Besides, the assurance is given that prayer will be answered. "Prove me now" is God's invitation, and they who like Muller and Spurgeon and tation testify that the answers come. God keeps his promise and none that go to him in spirit and in truth are sent empty away.

A KANSAS Y. M. C. A.

AMONG the thriving Young Men's Christian Associations of the West, that of Marion, Kans., holds a prominent place. Although the town is comparatively small it has furnished a band of young men so earnest in religious work and so energetic and enterprising that they have erected the substantial Association building, of which a picture appears in this column. This building, which covers an area of fifty by a hundred feet, cost $24,000, and is excellently adapted for its purpose. It is a very hopeful sign in these rapidly grown Western towns when their young men are ready to make sacrifices to build such a house for their religious work. A still more remarkable evidence of the consecrated spirit of these Kansas young men appears in a recent report of the State Association. It is there stated that no less than four general secretaries have resigned to enter the foreign mission field, and are on the way to Africa. The Secretary adds that he has reason to believe that scores of young men will soon come forward to consecrate themselves to the same work. Many of these are college students of whom there were two hundred at the last annual Bible Conference held at Marion.

WORK FOR KING'S DAUGHTERS.

An opportunity for King's Daughters who are longing to serve Christ in a foreign field is presented in a letter published in the Silver Cross. It comes from a lady engaged in mission work in India, to Mrs. Skidmore, who presides over the Committee of the King's Daughters on Foreign Mission Work. Although the demand is for educational rather than religious work the writer of the letter is anxious that such positions as she describes should be filled by ladies who would co-operate with missionaries in enlightening the inmates of the Zenanas on the truths of the Gospel. She says: "Last evening a member of one of the oldest, most respected and wealthiest families of Hyderabad asked to see me about school. I was charmed with the family and with the unique, beautifully furnished house. The long passages and rooms leading to the zenana are paved with broad stone flags. There are several open courtyards, each with a fountain and small garden, and everywhere a cleanness and freshness not usual in Mohammedan houses. Some daintily furnished rooms were explained to be the school rooms! The family had employed an English governess, and these had been her quarters. The munshi who was guiding me said the Nawab "wants you to recommend another lady teacher." After I had seen everything, the Nawab said, "I have three requests: First I wish to send my third son, a lad of eight years, to your school; also my daughter, who is six. She will not be in parda (that is, shut in the zenana,) for two years yet, and in that time can make a good beginning with her education. I would be glad if you could arrange to take them all as boarders. (I told him it would not be possible at present.) Second, since you cannot, they will go as day pupils, and I would like to arrange for their luncheon. I will pay all expense. The little boy of four years may also go if he likes. Third, I want a resident teacher, who can instruct the zenana ladies, and look after the children, drive out with them, etc."

"I have given these details for a purpose. It is not the first time I have been asked to recommend a resident teacher for houses. It is quite the right thing now for the advanced families to employ English resident teachers for the children and Begums, the idea being that the contact of daily life and sound of the English language will inevitably result in a higher civilization. And I have seen enough of the women and girls who want these posts, to know that though some may exert good influence over the families, the majority are by no means fit for such important responsibility. If I only had it in my power to send a good, wise, Christian lady to every one who asks for a teacher, I would be most happy."

The lady adds that she thinks it probable that some really consecrated King's Daughter might like such work and she invites Mrs. Skidmore to send her the names of any she may know and can recommend. Mrs. Skidmore's address is 230 West 59th Street, New York.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR GRADUATION

AMONG many who have made excellent suggestions in reply to the problem submitted by the Golden Rule of the best method of getting members of Christian Endeavor Societies to graduate from verse readers to original speakers, is Rev. W. F. McCauley of Dayton, Ohio. His remarks show so kindly an appreciation of the difficulties of graduation and so friendly a sympathy with the would-be graduates that we copy them here for the benefit of those who have not read his letter. He says:

"Never fail to show appreciation when some timid member does for once attempt remarks or prayer. One reason why so many cling to the reading of a verse as the only method of participation is because they at some time did venture on a halting sentence or two of their own, and felt that they failed, and so never tried again. It is no uncommon thing for one to have an excellent speech in his mind and to be unable to say much of it. What he said may have been good, but it was so far below what he intended to say, that it all seems to him valueless, and he sits down discouraged. Show appreciation of that speech, for there can be no doubt that you were pleased to hear the attempt made, and the person will try again. Let those who are leaders attempt those things that are harder to them, and others will do the same. Add to your prayer-meeting participation in personal work for souls. Under the influence of such an example, the verse readers will themselves make progress. Other methods will work well in connection with this example of progress, but cannot work successfully independently of it."

AN INQUIRY.

A LETTER has come to the editor of this journal from H. C., of Lenox, Iowa, detailing circumstances which must be common to other localities and indicating an appreciation of opportunities which we trust is also common to them. It appears that Union Evangelistic meetings have recently been held at Lenox, and God has blessed them to the conversion of many young people. Our correspondent is anxious that in some way these new converts should be helped in their Christian life. A committee is formed to arrange a plan with that object. The committee is, as is fitting, composed of earnest Christian people, but they belong to different denominations. At least three branches of the church of Christ are represented among them. On what basis can they work harmoniously? To our correspondent and to all who may be similarly situated we heartily recommend the Christian Endeavor system. Its platform of seven principles which was published in this journal on Oct. 21, is one on which Evangelical Christians of all denominations may unite. Its methods of operation have been tested by Congregationalists, Baptists, Presbyterians, Methodists and many others and have been found effective for the very purposes mentioned by our correspondent. The uniform testimony of pastors, church officers and members wherever a Christian Endeavor Society has been organized and maintained is that it has led to a growth in grace, and to increased Christian activity. Denominational differences have been forgotten and all hands have joined in united effort for mutual edification and the winning of souls for Christ.

MOTHER KNOWS

Nobody knows of the work it makes
To keep the home together;
Nobody knows of the steps it takes,
Nobody knows—but mother.

Nobody listens to childish woes,
Which kisses only smother,
Nobody's pained by naughty blows,
Nobody—only mother.

Nobody knows of the sleepless care
Bestowed on baby brother;
Nobody knows of the tender prayer's,
Nobody—only mother.

Nobody knows of the lessons taught
Of loving one another;
Nobody knows of the patience sought,
Nobody—only mother.

Nobody knows of the anxious fears,
Lest darlings may not weather
The storm of life in after years,
Nobody knows—but mother.

Nobody kneels at the throne above,
To thank the heavenly Father,
For the sweetest gift—a mother's love;
Nobody can—but mother.

UNCLE JOHN'S TALKS.

He Tells About the Kaffirs and their Wonderful Progress—The Native African Choir.

MUSIC," said Uncle John, after the little ones had sung a hymn in their sweet, treble voices, "is a key to the heart. Even among the savage nations, the power of song is recognized and the best musician in a tribe is often accorded high honors. Long before Jubal there must have been excellent singers on the earth."

"The Germans are the most musical nation, are they not?" inquired one of the group.

"Italy and Germany can divide the honors, my little one," was the smiling reply. "But the love of song is universal and by no means confined to certain nations and climates, although in some it is more highly developed than in others. Even in Central Africa, where the densest ignorance prevails, the natives are susceptible to the influence of music and are attracted perhaps as much by the singing as by the preaching of the missionaries."

"I have listened to some negro singing that was beautiful," remarked mother.

"Ah, yes," responded Uncle. "Genuinely musical at heart, whether born here or in Africa, the negro delights in song. For several months past a party of South African native Christian singers has been delighting musical connoisseurs in England. They have sung before the Queen, the Bishop of London, and in a number of churches and public halls, and their vocalism has stood the test of the severest criticism. Now, these African Christians, who belong to various tribes and have most interesting histories, may at no distant date, sing their sweet songs of Zion to American audiences. Their history is given in a recent number of the Illustrated News of the World, and it is very interesting."

"Paul Xiniwe, the leader of the band, is a native Kaffir, belonging to King William's Town, Cape Colony. He was born in 1857, of Christian parents and studied his books to such purpose that he held while still young, a position in the government Telegraph Department. He afterwards qualified himself for a change as schoolmaster at Port Elizabeth, Cape Town, and four years ago became a member of the African Choir. Mrs. Paul Xiniwe, his wife, is also a Christian, and is young, pleasant-featured, and fairly educated. Makhomomo Manye, another female member of the choir, is a Basuto and an accomplished linguist, speaking five languages including English, Boer, Dutch, High Dutch, Amaxosa Kaffir and Basuto. She is not yet twenty. Her father was a Basuto and her mother an Umbo—both being devout Christians. Makhomomo taught school and sewing-classes at Kimberly and was leading voice in a native church choir.

Johanna Jonkers is a pure Zulu, notwithstanding her Dutch name. Her parents were taken captives from the Zulu country by the Boers. During her childhood Johanna had bitter experience of the hardships of slave life. Both her parents were Christians.

"Josiah Semouse, another of the singers, is also a Basuto and the son of native Christians. His father was a local preacher and a man of considerable education. Semouse fought on the side of the Boers during the war with England. When the war closed he travelled afoot the entire distance of four hundred miles to the native school at Lovedale, Cape Colony, being determined, as he explains, to reach a point where he could be both educated and civilized. There he entered the school or college, and remained until March of this year when he undertook the management of the African choir and came to England."

THE NATIVE AFRICAN CHRISTIAN SINGERS.

"Quite half-way round the world," said Tom.

"Yes. These singers from the Dark Continent were awestruck by the wonderful things they saw on reaching Europe. They feel now, more than ever, the advantages of Christian civilization and they deplore the lack of facilities for educating the African natives. They believe that the problem of negro civilization will be greatly assisted to a solution by the establishment of technical schools, to teach manual skill and useful occupations generally, and the principal object of the tour is to interest public sentiment all over the Christian world in that behalf. They have an enthusiastic conviction that a great future awaits Africa, which owes all the material and intellectual progress its people have yet accomplished to the influence of Christianity and a Christian civilization."

"Are the Kaffirs a great nation?" was asked. "At one time undoubtedly they were. The various tribes now probably number less than two million souls. You know they extend across the African Continent, in the south. Britain annexed a part and so did the Dutch settlers. Their language is Bantu and three good Wesleyan missionaries—the Revs. Wm. Shaw, W. J. Shrewsbury and W. B. Boyce translated the Gospels for them in 1841. Since then they have had a plentiful supply of New Testaments and in 1878 the entire Bible was translated into their tongue. Up to 1889 a single Bible Society had distributed over 50,000 printed portions of Scripture among them. Kaffir-land is thickly populated and its people are among the finest of African types in strength, courage and intelligence. The Moravians were the first to send missionaries to Kaffraria in 1818, I believe—the Gospel pioneer being pastor von der Kemp, who was sent out by the London Missionary Society in 1798. There are many mission stations there now, representing a score of denominations and all doing noble work for the spread of the Gospel."

The Art of Not Hearing.

THE art of "not hearing," remarks a writer in the Presbyterian, should be learned by all. There are so many things which it is painful to hear, very many of which, if heard, will disturb the temper, corrupt simplicity and modesty, detract from contentment and happiness. If a man falls into a violent passion, and calls us all manner of names, at the first word we should shut our ears, and hear no more. If in a quiet voyage of life we find ourselves caught in one of those domestic whirlwinds of scolding, we should shut our ear as a sailor would furl his sail, and, making

"From a man's standpoint it was a good sermon, no doubt," remarked a lady. "The Prodigal Son is always returning, and the fatted calf is continually being killed. But I think it is time that something was said and done for the prodigal daughter. She is condemned without mercy by her own sex, and woe betide her if she leans for support upon the other. The next time you want a topic for a stirring sermon think of the hopeless fate."

Pity the prodigals! Whether son or daughter the parent's heart goes out to each alike. Cruel conventionalism has decreed that for the female prodigal there is no return this side the grave; but the Father above gives to both penitents an equal share in his forgiveness and his love.

MIND AND SOUL TRAINING.

WE teach for eternity. The weal or woe of the child is largely in the hands of him that has the shaping of its character in its early training. An unhappy speech, an improper habit, an unfortunate gesture, may start a child along a line of evil that may result in its final ruin. Can any one then look lightly upon a work the neglect of which may prove so disastrous? Yet it cannot be denied that many fail to comprehend its importance. Children are left to themselves; they are left to judge, and chose for themselves in matters that require ripe years and wide experience to decide. Grievous consequences follow. These are a pang most severe in the heart of the child, and cause incurable wounds in the heart of the parent.

A dying father, writes Rev. G. M. Elliott, in The Householder, once said to his children. "I verily believe that not one of you will dare meet me in the judgment in an unconverted state." His life, his teaching, both in precept and in example, had been such that they would be without an excuse for not being Christians. He had comprehended his duty, he had faithfully performed it, and had faith to believe that the promise would be fulfilled. "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it."

Think of it. Training souls for eternity. Impressing minds with truth that will lead them to eternal joy, or begetting thoughts and habits that will sink the soul in perdition. This is a work that is neither light nor trifling. Can we afford for one moment to neglect it? Shall we be excused at the bar of our great Judge for the neglecting of a duty so responsible?

The ships that in the distance die
Have not gone down into the deep;
They mount the waves, however high,
And still their onward courses keep,
Until they reach the destined strand—
The harbor of the looked-for land.

Sunday Table-Talk.

Why should we be at a loss for conversational topics at the Sunday dinner-table, any more than on other days? Yet it is not uncommon to sit down to the Sabbath meal and find oneself facing a gloomy enough gathering; sombre faces, dull eyes and silent lips, that hardly open except to admit the spoon or to utter a monosyllable to the waiting-maid. The true and fitting topic for Sunday dinner table-talk is the sermon, every remembered point of which will suggest some idea. Not to pick the sermon to pieces or to cavil at the preacher, but to take it in its entire meaning and intelligently apply it to ourselves.

Apologues, a writer in the Mid-Continent relates the following incident: A man once reached a church just as the people were leaving. Accosting an usher he said, "What is the sermon over?" "No," replied the usher, "it's only begun." This idea is a good one, but it does not seem to prevail to any large extent. The sermon ought to begin as soon as one leaves the house of worship, but if the conversation of the people on their way home is any test, the sermon may be in their hearts or somewhere else, but in many cases it is certainly not upon their lips. We once overheard a conversation between two ladies who were returning from a large and fashionable church. The sole topic of conversation was the singing of the choir. One singer was praised and another was criticised and if we had not known they had been to church we would have concluded they had been attending an opera. If it is not the singing that is talked about on the way from church, it is often the weather, the bonnets, the dresses. The indulgence of such frivolous talk, which on Sunday is doubly wrong and sinful, is the best way Satan could devise for effacing the effect of a good sermon.

Prodigal Children.

EVERY one knows the parable of the "Prodigal Son," but few have thought of an equally applicable parable of the "Prodigal Daughter." Is there not such a prodigal, then? Or is it that, through some strange and unaccountable pessimism on the part of society, the "Prodigal Daughter" does not receive a warm welcome home, like the erring but repentant son. An illustration in point is recorded by a very bright correspondent of the Woman's Chronicle. The sermon had been on the "Prodigal Son," and the pastor and parishioners were walking homeward, discussing the service.

He only said that the strange man had been meddling with what did not concern him."

"Then he did not tell you that this meddler was Seti?"

"Certainly not."

"Nor did the nurse?"

"No—but she is mortally afraid of the man, and that may have kept her silent."

"Nor did the young lady?"

"No; but she had some difficulty in getting admission to the house, as I think you had; and it is possible that the man would not admit her till she had promised not to interfere, and had sent away her servants. Indeed I thought I overheard as much."

"No doubt the fellow will be troublesome. The only thing to be done is to keep such a force here as will be able to control him. As long as we are here we can do this; but when we leave we must leave behind others who will make our places good. I think I can arrange for this. . . . Now that we have come to an understanding, let us go in; but do you take the lead, as is fitting, in making the changes."

When they re-entered the room they found the man standing where they had left him—with anything but amiability in his face.

"We have agreed," said the leech to him, "in order to satisfy important friends, to try for a while a change in the treatment. Sometimes the failing powers will rally wonderfully under a complete change of conditions. At any rate we will try it."

He at once set wide open door and casement. Then going to the water-jug, he poured out a large cup full of water and brought it to Aleph, who had kneeled at the bedside and was listening again to the parched and twitching lips of the unconscious woman. He let a few drops fall upon them. He gently tried to part the locked teeth, and dropped more. At last he put the cup to her mouth.

"Stop!" shouted the husband as he rushed up—his face white with passion and a demon looking out of his eyes—and with his clenched hand struck the cup aside, spilling a large part of the water on the woman's face—"Stop! I say, this woman is under my protection."

In a moment, Aleph was erect and confronting him:

"And such a protection!" he scornfully said.

"Such a protection as the thunder cloud gives to the tree it strikes—such a protection as you have been giving her, ever since you enticed her away from her friends under the pretense that you were a man, and not a brute. To my eyes the very shadow that you cast, and a very black shadow it is, is that of a wild beast of the meaner kind. I have not listened at these white lips in vain. I know something of your story, and expect to know more, shortly—know enough now to say that this woman wishes no such protector. Death would be a better one. After having made her life miserable: you shall not go on to put her to death—as you seem to wish. Now, do you understand that we shall proceed to treat this woman as the leech has said, and if you interfere, or make any disturbance whatever unsuitable to a sick room, we will find such ways of quieting you as may be necessary—for quiet we will have even if we have to turn you over to the police as a dangerous character."

Aleph said this, not loudly, but in so determined and commanding a manner, and with such rebuking and threatening eyes fastened on the hateful face before him, that for a moment that face took on a shade of fear and shame among its other shades—of which it had not a few. But it was only for a moment. He reinforced himself, as such fellows are apt to do, by a mighty oath, and seemed about to spring on the young man; but noting again his watchful eye, the cane in his hand, and his whole attitude so full of lithe and conscious power, he thought better of it, and fell back on the fighting resources of his tongue.

"This is my wife, and this is my house, at least for the time being; and I will do with them as I please. Because you are an aristocrat, and belong to the university, and wear better clothes than I, you think you can treat me like a dog. But a dog can bite, especially one of my breed; and if I had as many heads as Cerberus they should all have a bite at you. So help me all the infernals."

He flung out of the room. They heard him fiercely unfastening the street-door and then fiercely slamming it behind him as he rushed into the street.

Aleph at once followed him and secured the door. Returning, he resumed his work at the bed as if nothing had happened—no more color in his cheek, no more excitement in his eyes, no less steadiness in his hand as he again held a cup of water to the woman's lips. Her eyes were now opened and fastened on him. Perhaps the water with which her face had been flooded had freshened her back to consciousness. Perhaps too the stormy scene that had just passed did something toward summoning back her retreating vitality. While she drank, cup after cup, as if it were the nectar of the immortals, she never took her eyes, eyes that seemed full of wonder, from the calm, compassionate, restful young face that bent over her. She afterwards said that it seemed to her the face of some benevolent and protecting divinity.

Her skin grew moist. Great beads of sweat came out on her forehead. By degrees her eyelids drew together and she slept—slept as sleeps the infant, or as sleeps some still landscape after the drenching shower has passed.

"What food did she ask for yesterday?" said the leech to the nurse, who had just come in from another room. "Make ready the same for her against she awakes."

"And the lady Rachel," said Aleph, "will excuse me for suggesting that she ought now to relieve herself from her burden. The woman will do quite as well if laid quietly down."

So Rachel softly disengaged herself and gently placed the thin, worn, but now placid cheek on the pillow. She then went to the casement and stood there a moment reflectively. Then, turning to Aleph, she said:

"I think I will step out into the open air, and perhaps you will be kind enough to follow me."

Of course he followed her. Such a vision of loveliness and grace as glided past him into the court is not apt to summon even a philosopher in vain. I am not sure but that he would have followed her to Britain had she asked him, instead of that rude bench in the farther part of the court where she seated herself and invited him to do the same.

She said that he must not wonder that she wanted to thank him for standing between her and insult yesterday at the synagogue—also must not wonder that she had a woman's curiosity to know by what means he had managed to gain admittance to the house, and then to carry his point so fully with the leech. Would he explain? So he gave a modest account of his dealings with both the husband and the leech; and then smilingly demanded reciprocation. The lady must not wonder that he too had some curiosity to know something of her experience with the same rough customers. He found that, as the leech had surmised, she could not get admittance to the house till she had sent back her servants and had promised not to interfere personally with the treatment. She was very reluctant to do both things; but she felt that she could not desert her nurse at such a time. Besides, she was expecting Seti, and encouraged herself with the hope of his speedy arrival. However, she was almost afraid to come within doors; the man was so rude and surly. And she did not fail to tell what a weight was lifted from her mind as soon as Aleph made his appearance.

But what did he propose? Would not Miriam's husband come back and break up all that had been done? And such a desperado! What threats! She trembled to think what he might do. Must not Aleph be on his guard? How sorry she was that his unselfish efforts for others should bring him into such perils! Her lips quivered, and she looked at him with moist, anxious eyes.

Aleph acknowledged that he thought the fellow capable of the worst. He would be on his guard. At the same time he did not think that they need fear his return. If he should come back he must find men in the house able to control him. So the leech and himself would remain until the coming of Seti; who perhaps would accompany her home and return with two strong and resolute men to take their places. So by alternation they must secure the patient till she could be taken elsewhere—which he thought would be very soon. What did the lady think of the plan?

See thought favorable of it; and had no doubt but that her father would do the same. But what trouble and danger Aleph was taking on himself in all this!

"Do I look as if troubled by it?" said the young man cheerfully. "You see, I am here partly for educational purposes; and I consider the opportunities which may daily come to me for dealing wisely and helpfully with men as so many valuable teachers; and, as to personal danger, I am quite willing to pay that price for my tuition. But pardon me, lady, when I say that you who leave your palace for such a place as this, and submit to bad air, and rude treatment and risk of health for the sake of a very humble person who can never repay you, ought not to be surprised at my conduct. I am comparatively selfish in my conduct. In purity of motive, I fear that you have greatly the advantage of me. Still I hope that you will not on that account refuse my interested help in your disinterested work. By and by, when my education is finished, I hope my motives will be as unselfish as your own." He smiled as he added, "But I should be sorry to have you think that I am, even now, quite without pity for suffering, and indignation at justice and wrong."

After a moment's pause, during which his face resumed the serene gravity of expression which was habitual to it, he went on:

"But, lady, besides wanting to complete my education, I have another want in regard to which you may perhaps help me, and so amply compensate me on commercial principles for all I have done or may do for your friend. I am very much interested to get accurate information from Judæa about Jesus. Any news that may reach you about that remarkable person will be to me like waters to a desert. Your father's position is such that information will come to him and to you."

"I am not sure of that," returned Rachel. "We get, it is true, a plenty of rumors and opinions about Jesus; but they come to us, I fear, shaped and colored by the strong prejudices and seeming interests of the chief people of our nation, who are mostly hostile to him. These are about the only ones with whom my father is in communication. But now and then we meet with a man, like Simeon, who heartily wishes to know the truth, whatever that may be."

"Such was the impression he made on me," said Aleph.

"Speaking of him," said the maiden, "reminds me of a piece of news which he brought us this morning, and which my anxiety about Miriam had almost driven from my mind. He said that he had just heard from a friend whom he had engaged to make certain inquiries for him that in the birth-registers of Bethlehem is recorded the birth, some thirty years ago, of one Jesus, the son of Joseph and Mary, both of whom are said to be descended from David. He also said that the same friend reported some additional particulars in regard to the reformer John, who made so great a stir a short time before Jesus became generally known, and whom many for a time took to be the Christ."

"Pray tell me of him," said the young man, with a kindling face, "for I have heard absolutely nothing. And yet the Sacred Books say that the Messiah must have a forerunner like Elijah in character, if not in name. I have had a difficulty here."

"Perhaps, then, what I have to tell may help you as it has helped me. Simeon learns that this man, who for a time filled the eye of the whole people and was then put to death by that Ahab whom we call Herod, was exceedingly like Elijah in austerity of life and fearless denunciation of sin, and that he distinctly forbade the people to count him more than the forerunner of the Christ, and even introduced Jesus to the people as being the Christ they were expecting. And this agrees with the reports that reached Alexandria at the time."

"Many thanks for this information; it adds another link to the chain of evidence I am seeking."

"So it has been with me," said the maiden, while a shade of deeper thoughtfulness, if not of sadness, came over the bewildering beauty of her face as she added, "and I begin to fear that our chain when followed to the end will conduct us to some new and very unpopular interpretations of the prophets."

"I have for some time been prepared for that," said the young man calmly, and even cheerfully. "The great thing is to get at the truth: and I whom you have suffered to read your face as we have talked together need no further assurance that we think alike in this matter. We are both young, and youth can accommodate itself more easily than age to new views if they must come. May Aleph, the Chaldean stranger, venture so largely as to hope that in his search for the Messiah he may still have the aid of one whom he knows to be the first lady in the land in position, and whom her grandfather, who ought to know, and whom I am far from being disposed to contradict, pronounces the Gem of Alexandria?"

"You do well to smile," said the maiden, blushing. "My grandfather is very poor authority on such matters. I happen to know that Alexandrian gems are of very poor quality and mostly fictitious. But seriously, whatever a Jewish maiden can properly do to help in your matter she will gladly do, both for her own sake, and for his sake who has been in this city, perhaps three days, and has as many times befriended me and mine."

Here a loud knock was heard at the street-door. They at once returned to the sick-room—and Aleph went on to answer the knock, hoping to find Seti. And Seti it proved to be. Before conducting him to the others, Aleph briefly and in a low voice explained the situation and received the full approval of the Egyptian. On entering the sick-room they found the patient awake with intelligence in her eye, and her arm about the neck of Rachel, who had kneeled at the bedside. The nurse was standing at a little distance with a bowl of food.

"I am afraid of Antis," they heard murmured as they came near.

"You mean your husband?" inquired Rachel.

"Yes," feebly articulated the woman; "he is a fearful man—a murderer. Do not leave me with him"—and her arms clung still more closely about the fair neck as if for protection.

"He shall not trouble you more," said Seti emphatically, as he showed himself. "But now take some food,"—and he beckoned the nurse forward.

Supported by Rachel from behind, Miriam supped from a spoon at intervals with apparent relish, till at length her eyelids again crept slowly together and she was gently laid back in her unfinished slumbers.

"She will do well, but must not relapse again," said Seti; and turning to the leech, "Keep on as you have begun—we will take the responsibility. I confirm all that this young man has promised. He will, I understand, remain with you till I can accompany the lady home, and come back with some men to relieve him and you. Of course, after what the sick woman has said of her husband, we are justified in excluding him from the house. Do not allow him to enter under any pretence. If he insists, threaten him with the police."

As Aleph put up the bars of the street-door behind Rachel and her escort, he felt as if he were barring out a sunbeam. There is nothing like a human face of the deviner type to light up a poor and dark house. Aleph did not realize how poor and dark that sick house was in itself till Rachel had left it and he had again placed himself at the bedside. Here he sat for quite a time lost in thought till, suddenly, he became aware that Miriam was awake and with wide eyes of placid wonder was gazing at him. At a sign the nurse came forward with more food and drink, supported her while he gently put to her lips at intervals a little of both, and then gently laid her down, her drooping eyes still seeking his face to renewed slumber. This occurred again before Seti appeared with three strong and resolute looking men—who being old servants of Alexander and well known to Miriam in former days, were thought most likely to give her a sense of security by their presence.

QUESTIONS & ANSWERS

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Moses Poindexter Sedalia, Mo. What books should a young minister have and where can they be procured?

See answer to M. C., Vandalia, in No. 46 of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

H. B. W., Glassboro, N. J. Did Christ ever pray with his disciples?

Unquestionably, both for and with them. The most striking instance is Luke 11: 1 to 4 and parallel passages.

E. H., Burlington, Ia. Why is it that Christians consider Sunday as the Sabbath of the Fourth Commandment, while the Hebrews regard Saturday as the Sabbath of that Commandment, and the Mohammedans observe Friday? Is the Commandment applicable to any day of the week?

See answer to Mrs. J. D., Brooklyn, in No. 28 of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

A. D. Keys, Baltimore, Md. Were the Nicolaitans mentioned in Rev. 2: 6 a sect? In verse 15, what were the special features of the doctrine spoken of?

They were the followers of Nicolas, a sect whose deeds were condemned and who are supposed to have held the doctrines of Balaam. The Church branded them. (See Acts 15: 20, 21; 11. Peter 2: 15; Jude 11.) Their doctrines were supposed to be those denounced in Acts 15: 20, 29.

Subscriber, Johnson Co., Mo. Do you consider that what money one spends at a church social, or church entertainment, can be included in the Lord's tenth?

Not if you receive the value of it in food or amusement. If you pay your money and lay away, you might possibly so regard it; not otherwise.

A Subscriber, Hamsted, N. Y. Who is author of the Hymn: "There is a Happy Land?"

Andrew Young, a Scottish Presbyterian, wrote it in 1810.

A number of letters have been received, containing further answers to Mrs. M. Hatch's inquiry as to the authorship of the verse:

"When we've been there ten thousand years,
Bright, shining like the sun etc.

arah C. Fonda, Mendon, Mich., writes that the verse occurs in the hymn beginning

Thou, dear Redeemer, dying Lamb
We love to hear of Thee.

published in a collection entitled The Choralist, Mrs. J. P. Westerfield Salem, Mo., finds it in Jerusalem my happy home," as published in Select Melodies in 1856; S. A. Keyes, Germania, Wis., makes the same discovery; A. E. Angers, Rochester, N. Y., finds it in the hymn, "When I can read my title clear," published in The Singing Pilgrim in 1860; Charles Hopkins, Providence, R. I., finds it in the hymn beginning, "O, happy soul, how fast thou go," in Songs of Zion, W. C. Manchester being the writer.

H. M., (A Subscriber), Wisconsin. 1. Where did St. Paul suffer martyrdom and why? 2. What is the meaning of putting new wine into new bottles? 3. What is required of Christians in respect to fasting? 4. How is it that our Elders who enjoy the gift of healing are exceedingly few, when our Saviour commissioned his disciples to go and heal diseases even before the Day of Pentecost? 5. When the Prodigal returned to his father the best robe was put upon him and a ring on his hand. What is meant by these and also by putting shoes on his feet?

1. He was beheaded at Rome, in A. D. 67 or 68 by order of Nero, because of his profession of the Christian faith. 2. New wine in a condition of active fermentation, is liable to burst old bottles; hence it was in new bottles. The bottles, being of skin, are elastic. 3. See Luke 2: 37; Acts 13: 23; 1 Cor. 7: 5; 2 Cor. 6: 5 and 11: 27, like passages for a clear conception of the use of fasting in Christian life. 4. Because impression has long been prevalent in the Church that the day of miracles is past. 5. The Prodigal was probably ragged, barefoot and hungry, and they clothed him, fed him and gave him shoes. The ring signified honor and confidence. He was to be accorded all rights and privileges of sonship, now that he had forsaken his sin and returned to the arms of a loving father.

Ross, Canboro, Ont. What authority has a man for claiming the title "Reverend"? If he has the Word of God as authority, what does the title mean? 2. Have we any authority for saying that the world is growing better? If so, what does the Apostle mean in 11. Tim. 3: 13?

The title "Reverend" is not claimed on any ground as our correspondent suggests. It is a title of courtesy. What Scriptural authority has a man for claiming the title "Reverend"? If he has the Word of God as authority, what does the title mean? 2. Have we any authority for saying that the world is growing better? If so, what does the Apostle mean in 11. Tim. 3: 13?

are many clergymen who do not use the "Rev." Mr. Spurgeon prefers to be called "Pastor," and Mr. Dale and other famous ministers have declined to have "Rev." attached to their names. 2. In some respects the world is undoubtedly growing better. It is more merciful, more philanthropic, more ready to aid the sufferer from calamity. On the other hand evil men and seducers have grown worse, as Paul predicted they would. Their education and the resources of civilization have been used by them to increase their power and so far as religious doctrine is concerned there probably never has been a time before this in which so many teachers are deceiving and so many people are being deceived.

"A Subscriber who wants to do his duty." If the Pastor of the Church to which you belong prove unworthy of his position and plainly disobeys the teachings of God's word and refuses to acknowledge his error, should you continue to pay toward his support?

We cannot understand a church retaining in the pastorate a minister who "plainly disobeys the teachings of God's Word." If the church is content, you should take pains to find out whether you are not yourself in error in your interpretation of those teachings. If church and pastor are both disobeying, you are out of your place as a member of the church and should withdraw. While you retain your membership you ought to contribute to the expenses.

SONGS OUT OF SEASON.*

C FREQUENT and cheering sound in the woods during January and February was the resonant whistle of the cardinal grossbeak. This was all the more remarkable when colated with the fact that his song was not heard once during the succeeding winter. True, he and his mate were absent from November to February, but even when they returned, all their music seemed to be locked up in their throats.

It is not an uncommon occurrence to hear the loud Bish-er, bish-er! of the great Carolina wren in November and December, although the spring is his favorite season of song. The month of December was exceptionally warm even for this latitude, a fact that was favorable to my investigations, and I was surprised and delighted at the number of songs I heard. On the eleventh of the month—a clear, bright day—as I stood at the border of the woods the sweet, sad minor whistle of the black-capped chickadee fell on my ear, sounding from the sylvan depths like the lament of some love-lorn sprite whose heart had been broken by the defection of a fickle suitor. Again on the nineteenth those pensive notes were heard: Wh-e-e-e, wh-e-e-phit; wh-e-e-e, wh-e-e-phit! so sad and far-away that the tears almost started to my eyes.

The bugle call of the tufted titmouse in early spring is one of the most stirring sounds of the season and passes for the song of that bird, and there is a certain clarion-like music about it. Although it is seldom repeated, except in the spring, I have heard it more than once in November, December and January, piped in soft, almost dulcet tones.

Have other students of the bird kingdom heard the song of the white-throated sparrow in the autumn? It is a rare sound, yet I heard it one day in October while strolling through the woods. This matchless songster seems to carry an Æolian harp in his throat. Like a wavering line of light it comes up from the tanglewood. The movement is deliberate at first, then becomes more and more accelerated, and dies away in a cadence exquisitely sweet.

However, no bird has afforded me so much delight in this special line of investigation as the song sparrow; not because he sings more sweetly than many other minstrels, but because of his indefatigable industry. I have heard him singing with great vigor as early as February, during a few days of warm weather, and of course every one who pays the slightest attention to birds has been delighted with his madrigals and lullabies in March, April, June and July.

Have you ever heard this indomitable musician singing a Christmas carol? I have the pleasure of recording such a piece of good fortune. Christmas morning was rather cold, but the sky was cloudless, and as I strolled out to the pond my ears caught the jubilant "Glory to God in the highest" of my favorite lyrist—a fact of which I feel a little proud, and I think justly.

LIFE FAILURES.†

Even the strictest fidelity to your earthly master will not take the place of faithfulness to God. When M. Colbert, a successful merchant in France, was laid down with his last illness, a letter was brought to him from the king, but he refused so much to have it read to him. "Let him leave me in peace," exclaimed he. "Had I done for my God what I have done for that man, I would be happier now." It was a remarkable expression from dying lips, showing that it is quite possible, with all worldly integrity and success, to forget that there is one above to whom we are first of all responsible. The mere making of money, whether for ourselves or for our superior, comes a long way short of indicating a successful life; to be worth having or earning, it must have the blessing of God resting upon it. When Jacob Astor, the well-known millionaire who by his own abilities had raised himself from a very humble position to be one of the foremost men in the United States, was dying, he asked to be supplied with a sheet of paper and a pencil; and what do you suppose he wrote? The man who had been the envy of all his fellows, and had amassed more money than he knew what to do with, scratched with his trembling hand the melancholy confession, "My life has been a failure! Ah! my reader, your life too must in the end prove a failure, unless the smile of God rests upon you.

A HARD MASTER.

ROBERT STAPLES left his native village, to enter into service, at a place many miles away. Not long since he returned to his father's cottage, in a very poor plight. His clothes were shabby, his pockets empty, and his countenance sad. He had not been many days at home, before old James Dixon saw him passing, and called out to him, "Robert, how is this? Have you left your situation?"

"You may say that, Mr. Dixon," replied Robert, "Yes, I have done with Skinfint."

"Ah, indeed?" said the old man inquiringly; "I should like to know a little about this, Robert. Who is Skinfint? And why do you say you have done with him?"

"As to that, everybody where I have been knows who old Skinfint is? It is the same who was my master; a hard master."

"In what way was he a hard master, Robert?"

"In every way, Master Dixon; he used me badly, very badly, and I don't care who knows it. First of all, as you know, he enticed me away from a good place, where I was well off; at least, his steward did, which is the same thing. He promised me all sorts of things, if I would go and live with him."

"Yes, yes, Robert, I know all about it. He said you should have high wages, and light work; good clothes, and plenty to eat and drink."

"He did," said Robert fiercely, "and now just see what a condition I am come home in. These rags are all I have got to cover me, and I can almost count the bones in my body for very starvation."

"So then, Robert, your new master did not keep his promises?"

"Not he," replied Robert, "he never does. I did not come away a bit too soon."

"So it seems. But you have not told me yet how you were taken in and served. Let me hear all about it, Robert. What work did you have to do?"

"All sorts of it, and hard work, too, Mr. Dixon, I was up early and late, and had no rest, as one may say, day or night. It was all the same to my master. Hot or cold, it did not signify, and whether I was well or ill, it was all one. Work, work was all the cry, from one week's end to another; Sunday and working-day."

"Indeed! that was bad, sure enough. But did you not complain?"

"Why I did grumble at times, but there was little use in that. One day my master would promise fair that I should have easier work; and then the next day, he would rate me for being idle and good for nothing. But whatever he said, I found that the longer I lived with him, the worse I was used."

"Truly," said old James, "I do not much blame you for leaving such a service; but how about the fine clothes, and good living, and large wages; perhaps they made up for hard work?"

"I tell you it was all sham, Mr. Dixon. Do you think I should have come back such a scarecrow as I am if I had had better clothes to my back, or money in my pocket? And as to good living, I never had a good meal in his house, nor out of it, while I lived with him; and what I had was bad. He was a hard master, and there's an end of it."

"Then I will tell you, Robert, I am glad to see you back again, though you are come in such a sad plight; and there are more than I that will be glad. There is your old master, now; your first master I mean. I'll be bound to say he will take you on again, if you go and ask him."

"If I thought so," said Robert, in a desponding tone, "I would go and begin again; he would not care to speak to me."

"Robert, I heard him say, after you left him, what would come of it; for he knows that hard master of yours as well, or better than you do. So take my advice, and go to him directly, tell him your story, and I will answer for it, he will not turn you off."

"Well, I will go to-morrow."

"To-night, lad, to-night," cried out old James Dixon, very briskly, "to-night before the sun goes down."

Robert plucked up courage, and walked slowly towards the house of his first master, until, turning a corner, he was out of James Dixon's sight.

It was not long before he returned. There was joy in his very looks, and his step was quick and firm. His kind first master had taken him back into his service, without a reproachful word for having once deserted him. "And see," said Robert, as he gave Mr. Dixon an account of his reception, "he has paid me a whole week's wages in advance. More than I had the whole time I served that hard master."

"I am heartily glad of it," answered James Dixon, "and I guessed it would be so. But, now lad, I want another word or two with you before you turn in to rest. I am an old man, Robert, and you know I have stood your friend more than once in my life, so you will not feel offended at what I am going to say. Just sit down, Robert, for one minute."

Robert took a chair. "You have left one hard service, Robert, but I am afraid there is another hard master, that has got hold of you with a close grip. You have not given up the service of sin yet, have you, Robert?"

Robert shifted about uneasily in his chair. The truth is, old James knew more of this young man, than the reader need to be informed; and Robert knew in his heart and conscience, just as certainly, as some of our readers of this account, may know it of themselves, that he had not left the service of sin. "Sin is a hard master, Robert, is it not?"

Robert nodded assent. "Hard work, and dirty work, and disgraceful work, is sin-work, Robert. It's nothing but slavery, if we look at it rightly."

Robert seemed at first inclined to dispute this. But his conscience told him it was true; so he said nothing, and old James went on.

"Poor wages, the wages of sin, Robert. The Apostle Paul might well ask, 'What fruit had ye in those things, whereof ye are now ashamed? Rom. 6: 21. Terrible wages, of sin, Robert. Death, nothing less than death. Rom. 6: 23. Do you not know this my dear lad? Then why not give it up, Robert?"

VAN HOUTEN'S COCOA

Best & Goes Farthest.

"Samuel, my boy, they've quarrelled. Yer mother-in-law says there is nothin' like VAN HOUTEN'S COCOA. An' the shepherd sticks to his rum and water. There's no need to drop him in the water—burr after All, Samuel."

MASON & HAMLIN

Examine the new Mason & Hamlin Piano and Organ catalogues, sent free to any address. The Mason & Hamlin Grand and Upright Pianos are constructed on an Improved Method of Stringing, invented and exclusively used by Mason & Hamlin, by which remarkably purity of tone and great durability are secured, and phenomenal capacity to stand in tune. The lin SCREW-STRINGER was patented in July, 1883, and is a veritable triumph for American ingenuity, being pronounced by experts "the greatest improvement of the century" in pianos. American Pianos and Organs are superior to all others. Mason & Hamlin Organs have long been the Standard the world over. The Mason & Hamlin Piano is fast becoming as famous as the Mason & Hamlin Organ, and illustrates that HIGHEST STANDARD of excellence which has characterized the latter instrument, and won for it the Highest Honors at all great World's Exhibitions since Paris, 1867. Illustrated catalogues free.

Without under-estimating the improvements effected by others in pianos, the Mason & Hamlin STRINGER is claimed to be the greatest improvement of them all, and without it the highest attainable excellence is simply impossible.

Treat sin as you have treated your other hard master. Go straight to God your only right and true master. He invites you to it; he says, "Come unto me, all ye that are weary and heavy laden and I will give you rest."—Matthew 11: 28.

"Some day —" Robert was beginning to say, but old James stopped him.

"Some day! why to-morrow may be too late. Go to him Robert, and take the promise of Christ for your warrant: 'Him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out.'"

Whether Robert Staples acted according to the advice of his old friend, we know not, but James Dixon was right when he said that sin is a hard master.

An Artistic Christmas Number.

THE Christmas number of the Illustrated London News contains several very interesting literary articles, with numerous illustrations and a large presentation oleograph, "The Rival Belles," from the original picture by Eugene de Blaas. Father Christmas enlarged and improved, has forty pages of illustrations with appropriate rhymes and a charming picture entitled: "Now for the Baby Dogs," from the original by Fred Morgan; making it a very choice publication for the children.

You can't impose on some people without resistance; others, though quite as sensitive, are slower to protest. The same is true as to some organs of our body. The stomach will promptly resent imposition—the lungs will suffer long in silence. The first fact is disagreeable; the latter dangerous.

Beware of Colds. They are the recruiting officers for the Silent Army. They have an affinity for weak people and their weak parts.

But how shall the cold be kept out, or put out? By means of Drs. Starkey & Palen's COMPOUND OXYGEN. No drug. Just enriched and magnetized air. That's all. What keeps you alive, will in an enriched form, make you stronger. Is that reasonable? Yes, because it has done it for thousands, and for twenty-two years.

Write for a book of 200 pages in which patients everywhere describe, over their own names and addresses, their symptoms and their cure. The book costs nothing but the asking.

BETHLEHEM.

Our Saviour's Birthplace and the Venerable Church of the Nativity which Now Stands There.

W ORLDS sang and the stars swelled the angelic chorus on that night when the "Babe of Bethlehem" was born. Since then, nearly twenty centuries have passed, and the heaven-sent message that came to the adoring shepherds on the Judean plain has been told to countless millions. In that interval, Palestine has been overrun by invaders and vandal hands have destroyed many of the sacred places; but the City of David still stands serenely upon its green hillsides, overlooking the beautiful valley below.

Since the birth of Christ, Bethlehem has been visited by an unbroken series of pilgrims and travelers, whom its sacred associations have attracted thither. The cave or grotto in which tradition declares the Christ-Child was born, is pointed out to all who come there. To show his contempt for Christianity, the Roman Emperor Hadrian erected a temple over the grotto, dedicated to Venus and Adonis; but the shrines of those heathen deities have long since vanished and their sacrilegious effigies have been destroyed.

Nearly all there is of interest in Bethlehem centres around the Church of the Nativity, which is one of the oldest religious edifices in the world. It was erected by Constantine about the year 321, A.D., and stands over the site of the manger-cradle of the Saviour, in the grotto underneath. In this church, Baldwin was crowned as Christian King of Jerusalem, he having chosen Bethlehem for his coronation, because he was unwilling to wear a crown of gold where his Saviour had borne a crown of thorns! On this page, we reproduce from a former issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD an illustration showing the interior of the Church of the Nativity, taken from a photograph brought from Palestine by Dr. Talmage. Its aisles and corridors have been trodden by the feet of nearly fifty generations. On entering, its simplicity at once impresses the visitor. The aisles are flat-roofed and supported by massive pillars; the windows over the lofty nave, once beautifully ornamented, still show faint tracings of the pictures of saints and the armorial bearings of Crusaders who worshipped there eight hundred years ago. Above the marbled spaces between the high windows, and concealed by curtains, are altar-niches wherein the books of the Gospels rest, while all around are the remains of splendid mosaics, now in decay. A little way down the shaded aisle is an old baptismal font with an inscription in Greek, and on the walls, pillars and elsewhere are rudely engraved the crests of Crusader warriors, some of them bearing royal crowns above the helmets.

The Grotto of the Nativity—a spot unspeakably dear to the Christian heart—is directly underneath the Church. Evidently once a cavern, it is now a chamber, about forty feet in length and sixteen in width and with a height averaging ten feet. Two stairways lead from the Church to the Chapel, and a little forward is a niche or hollow in the wall of rock, before which is a white marble slab, set in the floor, with a silver star in the centre. On the star is inscribed:

HIC DE VIRGINE MARIA JESUS
CHRISTUS NATUS EST.

(Here Jesus Christ was born of the Virgin Mary.) This is the shrine of the Nativity. Pious pilgrims kneel and kiss the spot; monks bow low before it and all voices are hushed. As we gaze, we instinctively recall the story in the Gospels of that wondrous night when the shepherds, as they watched their flocks, heard the angel-song that announced the advent of the World's Redeemer. The swinging censers, the murmur of prayers and the mingled soft radiance of the silver lamps that perpetually burn before the shrine of the Manger, all add to the impression of sanctity that invests the place. There are eighteen of these silver lamps in the Grotto and they are tended by Greek, Latin and Armenian monks, each sect having six lights in charge. The shrine is in a semi-circular recess, about four feet in height, cut out of the limestone rock. Near it is the Chapel of the Magi, where, so tradition asserts, the three wise men from the East, Caspar, Melchior and Balthasar, came to adore the infant Redeemer, guided by his natal star. Near by are several passages and in a chamber is the "Altar of the Innocents" where the children slain by Herod's cruel mandate are said to have been buried. The floor and walls of the Grotto are of Italian marble, and walls and ceiling are almost entirely hidden, being covered with richly-embroidered cloth, studded in places with jewels. The hangings of many of the lamps are also brilliant with gems, some of them the gifts of royalty and of rich worshippers who have visited the Shrine of the Grotto.

So much that is legendary and traditional has been interwoven with the history of this spot, which was claimed as far back as the middle of the second century to have been the cradle of the Saviour, that it is now exceedingly

LIFE A SCHOOL.

Dr. Talmage's latest Sunday morning Sermon: "In all thy ways acknowledge him and he shall direct thy paths." Proverbs 3: 6.

"A PROMISE good enough for many kinds of life, but not for my kind of life," says some business man, "the law of supply and demand controls the business world." But I have reason to say that it is a promise to all persons in any kind of honest business.

There is no war between religion and business, between ledgers and Bibles, between churches and counting-houses. On the contrary, religion accelerates business, sharpens men's wits, sweetens acerbity of disposition, fills the blood of phlegmatics, and throws more velocity into the wheels of hard work. It gives better balancing to the judgment, more strength to the will, more muscle to industry, and throws into enthusiasm a more consecrated fire. You cannot in all the round of the world show me a man whose honest business has been despoiled by religion.

The industrial classes are divided into three groups: producers, manufacturers, traders. Producers, such as farmers and miners. Manufacturers, such as those who turn corn into food, and wool and flax into apparel. Traders, such as make profit out of the transfer and exchange of all that which is produced and manufactured. A business man may belong to any one or all of these classes, and not one is independent of any other. When the Prince Imperial of France fell on the Zulu battle-field because the strap fastening the stirrup to the saddle broke as he clung to it, his comrades all escaping, but he falling under the lances of the savages, a great many people blamed the Empress for allowing her son to go forth into that battle-field, and others blamed the English government for accepting the sacrifice, and others blamed the Zulus for their barbarism. The one most to blame was the harness-maker who fashioned that strap of the stirrup out of shoddy and imperfect material as it was found to have been afterward. If the strap had held, the Prince Imperial would probably have been alive to-day. But the strap broke. No prince independent of a harness-maker! High, low, wise, ignorant, you in one occupation, I in another, all bound together. So that there must be one continuous line of sympathy with each other's work. But whatever your vocation, if you have a multiplicity of engagements, if into your life there come losses and annoyances and perturbations as well as percentages and dividends, if you are pursued from Monday morning until Saturday night, and from January to January by inexorable obligation and duty, then you are a business man, or you are a business woman, and my subject is appropriate to your case.

We are under the impression that the moil and tug of business life are a prison into which a man is thrust, or that it is an unequal strife where unarmed a man goes forth to contend. I shall show you that business life was intended of God for grand and glorious education and discipline, and if I shall be helped to say what I want to say, I shall rub some of the wrinkles of care out of your brow, and unstrap some of the burdens from your back. I am not talking to an abstraction. Though never having been in business life, I know all about business men. In my first parish at Belleville, New Jersey, ten miles from New York, a large portion of my audience was made up of New York merchants. Then I went to Syracuse, a place of intense commercial activity, and then I went to Philadelphia, and lived long among the merchants of that city, than whom there are no better men on earth, and for more than twenty-two years I have stood in this presence, Sabbath by Sabbath, preaching to audiences, the majority of whom are business men and business women. It is not an abstraction to which I speak, but a reality with which I am well acquainted.

In the first place, I remark that business life was intended as a school of energy. God gives us a certain amount of raw material out of which we are to hew our character. Our faculties are to be reset, rounded and sharpened up. Our young folks having graduated from school or college need a higher education, that which the rasping and collision of every-day life alone can effect. Energy is wrought out only in a fire. After a man has been in business activity ten, twenty, thirty years his energy is not to be measured by weights or plumbets or ladders. There is no height it cannot scale, and there is no depth it cannot fathom, and there is no obstacle it cannot thrash.

Now, my brother, why did God put you in that school of energy? Was it merely that you might be a yardstick to measure cloth, or a steelyard to weigh flour? Was it merely that you might be better qualified to chaffer and higgler? No. God placed you in that school of energy that you might be developed for Christian work. If the undeveloped talents in the Christian churches of to-day were brought out and thoroughly harnessed, I believe the whole world would be converted to God in a short time. There are so many deep streams that are turning no mill-wheels and that are harnessed to no factory bands. Now,

God demands the best lamb out of every flock. He demands the richest sheaf of every harvest. He demands the best men of every generation. A cause in which Newton and Locke and Mansfield toiled you and I can afford to toil in.

Oh, for fewer idlers in the cause of Christ, and for more Christian workers, men who shall take the same energy that from Monday morning to Saturday night they put forth for the achievement of a livelihood or the gathering of a fortune, and on Sabbath days put it forth to the advantage of Christ's kingdom and the bringing of men to the Lord. Dr. Duff, in South Wales, saw a man who had inherited a great fortune. The man said to him: "I had to be very busy for many years of my life getting my livelihood. After a while this fortune came to me, and there has been no necessity that I toil since. There came a time when I said to myself, 'Shall I now retire from business, or shall I go on and serve the Lord in my worldly occupation?'" He said: "I resolved on the latter, and I have been more industrious in commercial circles than I ever was before, and since that hour I have never kept a farthing for myself. I have thought it to be a great shame if I couldn't toil as hard for the Lord as I had toiled for myself, and all the products of my factories and my commercial establishments to the last farthing have gone for the building of Christian institutions and supporting the Church of God." Oh, if the same energy put forth for the world could be put forth for God! Oh, if a thousand men in these great cities who have achieved a fortune could see it their duty to do all business for Christ and the alleviation of the world's suffering.

Again, I remark, that business life is a school of patience. In your every-day life how many things to annoy and to disquiet! Bargains will rub. Commercial men will sometimes fail to meet their engagements. Cash book and money drawer will sometimes quarrel. Goods ordered for a special emergency will come too late, or be damaged in the transportation. People intending no harm will go shopping without any intention of purchase, overturning great stocks of goods, and insisting that you break the dozen. More bad debts on the ledger. More counterfeit bills in the drawer. More debts to pay for other people. More meannesses on the part of partners in business. Annoyance after annoyance, vexation after vexation, and loss after loss. All that process will either break you down or brighten you up. It is a school of patience. You have known men under the process to become petulant, and choleric, and angry, and pugnacious, and cross, and sour, and queer, and they lost their customers, and their name became a detestation. Other men have been brightened up under the process. They were toughened by the exposure. They were like rocks, all the more valuable for being blasted. At first they had to choke down their wrath, at first they had to bite their lip, at first they thought of some stinging retort they would like to make; but they conquered their impatience. They have kind words now for sarcastic flings. They have gentle behavior now for unmannerly customers. They are patient now with unfortunate debtors. They have Christian reflections now for sudden reverses. Where did they get that patience? By hearing a minister preach concerning it on Sabbath? Oh, no. They got it just where you will get it—if you ever get it at all—selling hats, discounting notes, turning banisters, ploughing corn, tinning roofs, pleading causes. Oh, that amid the turmoil and anxiety and exasperation of every-day life you might hear the voice of God saying: "In patience possess your soul. Let patience have her perfect work."

I remark again, that, business life is a school of useful knowledge. Merchants do not read many books and do not study lexicons. They do not dive into profounds of learning; and yet nearly all through their occupations come to understand questions of finance, and politics, and geography, and jurisprudence, and ethics. Business is a severe schoolmistress. If pupils will not learn, she strikes them over the head and the heart with severe losses. You put $5,000 into an enterprise. It is all gone. You say, "That is a dead loss." Oh, no. You are paying the schooling. That was only tuition, very large tuition—I told you it was a severe schoolmistress—but it was worth it. You learned things under that process you would not have learned in any other way. Traders in grain come to know something about foreign harvests; traders in fruit come to know something about the prospects of tropical production; manufacturers of American goods come to understand the tariff on imported articles; publishers of books must come to understand the new law of copyright; owners of ships must come to know winds and shoals and navigation; and every bale of cotton, and every raisin cask, and every tea box, and every cluster of bananas is so much literature for a business man. Now, my brother, what are you going to do with the intelligence? Do you suppose God put you in this school of information merely that you might be sharper in a trade, that you might be more successful as a worldling? Oh, no; it was that you might take that useful information and use it for Jesus Christ. Can it be that you have been dealing with foreign lands and never had the missionary spirit, wishing the salvation of foreign people? Can it be that you have become acquainted with all the outrages inflicted in business life and that you have never tried to bring to bear that Gospel which is to expiate all evil and correct all wrongs and illumine all darkness and lift up all wretchedness and save men for this world and the world to come? Can it be that understanding all the intricacies of business, you know nothing about those things which will last after all bills of exchange and consignments and invoices and rent rolls shall have crumpled up and been consumed in the fires of the last great day? Can it be that a man will be wise for time and a fool for eternity?

I remark, also, that business life is a school for integrity. No man knows what he will do when he is tempted. There are thousands of men who have kept their integrity merely because they never have been tested. A man was elected treasurer of the State of Maine some years ago. He was distinguished for his honesty, usefulness and uprightness, but before one year had passed he had taken of the public funds for his own private use, and was hurled out of office in disgrace. Distinguished for virtue before. Distinguished for crime after. You can call over the names of men just like that, in whose honesty you had complete confidence, but placed in certain crises of temptation they went overboard. Never so many temptations to scoundrelism as now. Not a law on the statute book but has some back door through which a miscreant can escape. Ah! how many deceptions in the fabric of goods; so much plundering in commercial life that if a man talk about living a life of complete commercial accuracy there are those who ascribe it to greenness and lack of tact. More need of honesty now than ever before, tried honesty, complete honesty, more than in those times when business was a plain affair and woollens were woollens and silks were silks and men were men.

THE BANK NOTE'S APPEAL.

How many men do you suppose there are in commercial life who could say truthfully, "In all the sales I have ever made I have never overstated the value of goods; in all the sales I have ever made I have never covered up an imperfection in the fabric; of all the thousands of dollars I have ever made I have not taken one dishonest farthing?" There are men, however, who can say it, hundreds who can say it, thousands who can say it. They are more honest than when they sold their first tierce of rice, or their first firkin of butter, because their honesty and integrity have been tested, tried and came out triumphant. But they remember a time when they could have robbed a partner, or have absconded with the funds of a bank, or sprung a snap judgment, or made a false assignment, or borrowed illimitably without any efforts at payment, or got a man into a sharp corner and fleeced him. But they never took one step on that pathway of hell fire. They can say their prayers without hearing the chink of dishonest dollars. They can read their Bible without thinking of the time when with a lie on their soul, in the Custom House they kissed the Book. They can think of death and the judgment that comes after it without any flinching—that day when all charlatans and cheats and jockeys and frauds shall be doubly damned. It does not make their knees knock together, and it does not make their teeth chatter to read "as the partridge sitteth on eggs, and hatcheth them not; so he that getteth riches, and not by right, shall leave them in the midst of his days, and at his end shall be a fool."

Oh, what a school of integrity business life is! If you have ever been tempted to let your integrity cringe before present advantage, if you have ever wakened up in some embarrassment, and said: "Now, I'll step a little aside from the right path and no one will know it, and I'll come all right again; it is only once." Oh, that only once has ruined tens of thousands of men for this life and blasted their souls for eternity. It is a tremendous school, business life, a school of integrity. A merchant in Liverpool got a five-pound Bank-of-England note, and holding it up toward the light he saw some interlineations in what seemed red ink. He finally deciphered the letters, and found out that the writing had been made by a slave in Algiers, saying in substance: "Whoever gets this bank-note will please to inform my brother, John Dean, living near Carlisle, that I am a slave of the Bey of Algiers." The merchant sent word, employed government officers, and found who this man was, spoken of in this bank bill. After awhile the man was rescued, who for eleven years had been a slave of the Bey of Algiers. He was immediately emancipated, but was so worn out by hardship and exposure he soon after died. Oh, if some of the bank bills that come through your hands could tell all the scenes though which they have passed, it would be a tragedy eclipsing any drama of Shakespeare, mightier than King Lear or Macbeth.

As I go on in this subject, I am impressed with the importance of our having more sympathy with business men. Is it not a shame that we in our pulpits do not oftener preach about their struggles, their trials, and their temptations? Men who toil with the hand are not apt to be very sympathetic with those who toil with the brain. The farmers who raise the corn and the oats and the wheat sometimes are tempted to think that grain merchants have an easy time, and get their profits without giving any equivalent. Plato and Aristotle were so opposed to merchandise that they declared commerce to be the curse of the nations, and they advised that cities be built at least ten miles from the sea-coast. But you and I know that there are no more industrious or high-minded men than those who move in the world of traffic. Some of them carry burdens heavier than hods of brick, and are exposed to sharper things than the east wind, and climb mountains higher than the Alps or Himalayas, and if they are faithful Christ will at last say to them: "Well done, good and faithful servant; thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things. Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

We talk about the martyrs of the Piedmont valley, and the martyrs among the Scotch highlands, and the martyrs at Oxford. There are just as certainly martyrs of Wall Street and State Street, martyrs of Fulton Street and Broadway, martyrs of Atlantic Street and Chestnut Street, going through hotter fires, or having their necks under sharper axes. Then it behooves us to banish all fretfulness from our lives, if this subject be true. We look back to the time when we were at school, and we remember the rod, and we remember the hard tasks, and we complained grievously; but now we see it was for the best. Business life is a school, and the tasks are hard, and the chastisements sometimes are very grievous; but do not complain. The hotter the fire the better the refining. There are men before the throne of God this day in triumph who on earth were cheated out of everything but their coffin. They were sued, they were imprisoned for debt, they were throttled by constables with a whole pack of writs, they were sold out of the sheriffs, they had no compromise with their creditors, they had to make assignments. Their dying hours were annoyed by the sharp ringing of the door-bell by some impetuous creditor who thought it was outrageous and impudent that a man should dare to die before he paid the last three shillings and sixpence. I had a friend who had many misfortunes. Everything went against him. He had good business quality and was of the best of morals, but he was one of those men such as you have sometimes seen, for whom everything seems to go wrong. His life became to him a plague. When I heard he was dead, I said: "Good, got rid of the sheriffs!" Who are those lustrous souls before the throne? When the question is asked, "Who are they?" the angels standing on the sea of glass respond: "These are they who came out of great business trouble and had their robes washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb."

A man arose in Fulton Street prayer-meeting, and said: "I wish publicly to acknowledge the goodness of God. I was in business trouble. I had money to pay, and I had no means to pay it, and I was in utter despair of all human help, and I laid this matter before the Lord, and this morning I went down among some old business friends I had not seen in many years, just to make a call, and one said to me, 'Why, I am so glad to see you, walk in. We have some money on our books due you a good while, but we didn't know where you were, and therefore not having your address we could not send it. We are very glad you have come.' And the man standing in Fulton Street prayer-meeting said: "The amount they paid me was six times what I owed." You say it only happened so? You are an infidel. God answered that man's prayer. Oh, you want business grace. Commercial ethics, business honors, laws of trade, are all very good in their place, but there are times when you want something more than this world will give you. You want God. For the lack of him some that you have known have consented to forge, and to maltreat their friends, and to curse their enemies, and their names have been bulletined among scoundrels, and they have been ground to powder; while other men you have known have gone through the very same stress of circumstances triumphant. There are men here to-day who fought the battle and gained the victory. People come out of that man's store, and they say: "Well, if there ever was a Christian trader, that is one." Integrity kept the books and waited on the customers. Light from the eternal world flashed through the show windows. Love to God and love to man presided in that storehouse. Some day people going through the street notice that the shutters of the window are not down. The bar of that store door has not been removed. People say, "What is the matter?" You go up a little closer, and you see written on the card of that window: "Closed on account of the death of one of the firm." That day all through the circles of business there is talk about how a good man has gone. Boards of trade pass resolutions of sympathy, and churches of Christ pray, "Help, Lord, for the godly man ceaseth." He has made his last bargain, he has suffered his last loss, he has ached with the last fatigue. His children will get the result of his industry, or, if through misfortune there be no dollars left, they will have an estate of prayer and Christian example which will be everlasting. Heavenly rewards for earthly discipline. There "the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest."

THANKFUL FOR THUNDER.

WHILE Richard Weaver was conducting a revival service in a country town, a young man went up to him and told him that he had brought a conveyance to take him to the next town at which he was to preach. Weaver asked the young man his name, and when he heard it recognized it at once as that of a young man whose ungodly conduct had given his pious father and mother deep concern. The father, a respectable farmer, had begged the Evangelist to pray for him. Weaver was to stop at the farm-house, which was twenty miles distant. After the service he took his seat in the buggy by the young man's side. "The night was very stormy," said Weaver, "and as we went along, the farmer's son, who was driving, would exclaim after each vivid flash of lightning, 'Lord protect us.' I said, 'I hope it will keep on thundering.' 'Why do you say that?' the young man asked, in trembling voice. 'Do you not wish the storm to stop?' 'Yes,' I replied, 'but I wish much more that you might keep on praying.' On our arrival at the house, the farmer's wife was glad to see us safe home. 'Yes, I am right glad to be home,' I said; 'yet I would not have missed that storm for a good deal. Do you know, it made your son pray? and I hope that having approached God in the time of trouble, he will stay there all his life, for there alone is perfect peace and safety.' The young man did accept Christ as his Saviour. How many of us never think of God until the time of adversity—until the arm of flesh has failed us!"

BETHLEHEM.

difficult to discriminate among the many tales that are related to visitors by its monkish guardians. Within 120 years after Christ's death on the Cross, and shortly after the death of St. John the Evangelist, Justin Martyr spoke of the Saviour's nativity having occurred there, "in a certain cave, very close to the village." The celebrated Origen also speaks of the same cave as being recognized even by the heathen as the birth-place of our Lord. St. Jerome made his home in an adjacent cavern, that he might pass his days contiguous to a spot so sacred, and, in later times, the temple reared by the impious Hadrian over the grotto was destroyed specially to make room, for the Church of the Nativity—the most chaste architectural building in Palestine. Among the traditions brought down by the ages and retailed to the credulous by the Romish monks are those that relate to the identification of the spring from which the Holy Family was supplied with water, the spot where the vision appeared to command the flight into Egypt, the "Milk Grotto," near the entrance of the Grotto of the Manger, where the Holy Family are said to have hidden during the flight, and other apocryphal places.

To a Christian visiting the Grotto of the Nativity, one of the sights that make it hard to realise the sacred character of the place is the presence of armed Turkish soldiers who stand, with loaded rifles and bayonets fixed, as sentinels of the place. The population of Bethlehem is largely Christian, but among the three sects—Greek, Armenian and Latin—there is an intense jealousy, which at different periods has broken out into open strife. So bitter is it that no two of the sects will consent that the third shall have the honor of repairing the church, and so it is allowed to go to decay. Each sect has its altars and these have their special guardians. Some years ago, a monk set fire to the hangings of the altar of another sect and a violent collision followed in which, it is said, several persons were killed and the Turkish soldiers had to be called in to quell the disturbance. These soldiers are now kept there constantly, for every inch of the grotto is a ground of contention and the jealousies might again result in disturbance.

The surroundings of Bethlehem ("The City of Bread"), are among the most pastoral in Palestine. There are the fields in which Boaz met Ruth, the walks and gardens where David played and beyond them, lower down in the valley, the plain where the heavenly messenger appeared to the shepherds. Nearer the city is the "Well of Bethlehem, by the Gate," of whose refreshing water David longed to drink, when he was sore tried and thirsty in battle, and to draw from which three of his bravest warriors broke through the Philistine host. Sacred memories and Bible associations crowd on every hand; but all are overshadowed by the world's greatest event which has inspired the poets and preachers of the ages, given to man his brightest hope and brought healing and salvation to the nations. No poet has sung more sweetly of this glorious Christmas time than the old, blind Christian bard, John Milton did, of Christmas Day:

This is the month, and this the happy morn,
Wherein the Son of Heaven's Eternal King,
Of wedded maid and virgin mother born,
Our great redemption from above did bring:
For so the holy sages once did sing,
That he our deadly forfeit should release,
And with his Father work us a perpetual peace.

CHRIST'S KINGDOM.

S. S. Lesson for Jan. 3. By Mrs. M. Baxter.
Isa. 11 : 1-10. Golden Text, Ps. 72 : 8.

THE whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now." (Rom. 8 : 22.) Death, sickness, misery, injustice, oppression, following in the wake of sin, proclaim that another than Christ is the prince of this world. Evil seems everywhere to triumph; "Judgment is turned away backward, and righteousness standeth afar off; for truth is fallen in the street, and uprightness cannot enter. Yea; truth is lacking; and he that departeth from evil maketh himself a prey." (Isa. 59 : 14, 15; R. V.) All the foundations are out of course, and the same evils which are so manifest in the world flourish also in the professing Church of Christ. What is the secret of all this?

The King is Absent

from his kingdom. He alone can have power and authority to reduce to order the discordant elements which cause confusion. Some of his people know this, and from such the cry is ever going up, "Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly." And he will come; he is coming; the signs of his appearance are visible upon our horizon. "Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." But now Jerusalem is beginning to lift up her head, the city is almost rebuilt, and is largely extending, and the Jews, persecuted in Russia, and hated in Germany, are returning largely to their own land. Again, "Blindness in part hath happened unto Israel, until the times of the Gentiles be come in." But this blindness is passing away in a measure. Hundreds of thousands of New Testaments in Hebrew are being distributed to Jews in all parts of the world, and they are reading them with great interest. Thus God is preparing the way for the blindness to pass, because the times of the Gentiles are almost ended, and there will be fulfilled the prophecy: "The kingdom of this world is become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ; and he shall reign for ever and ever." (Rev. 11 : 15)

But this kingdom is "not of this world" and this King is not of this world, and yet the very last sight which the world had of Jesus was his death upon his cross, with a title written over him, "Jesus of Nazareth"

The King of the Jews.

And this King of the Jews—did he answer the description given of him in prophecy? We will see. "There shall come forth a shoot out of the stock of Jesse, and a branch out of his roots shall bear fruit; and the Spirit of the Lord shall rest upon him, the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and might, the spirit of wisdom and understanding" was upon him. As a child of twelve, when the doctors in the temple "were astonished at his understanding and answers;" in the synagogue of Capernaum, when his hearers were astonished at his teaching;" for he taught them as having authority, and not as the scribes;" in the temple, on the feast day, when the power of his words disarmed the very government officials who were sent to take him, and who said, "Never man spake like this man." So fully was he possessed with "the spirit of that, when the chief priests and scribes had been foiled in their attempts to trip him up in his words, and they had sent out spies which feigned themselves to be just men that they might take hold of his speech and deliver him up to the authority of the governor, his answer, "Render unto Cæsar the things which be Cæsar's, and unto God the things which be God's" took from them the ground of all their questionings, and forced them into silence. And when the Sadducees came with their carnal conceptions of the resurrection, and he discovered to them regions of truth above all their ideas "they durst not any more ask him any question;" it was indeed "the spirit of counsel and might."

"He shall not judge after the sight of his eyes, neither reprove (or "decide," margin) after the hearing of his ears." Jesus set the example to his church of referring all things, the smallest as well as the greatest, to his Father, taking nothing for granted, judging nothing by his own wisdom, sinless as it was, that all the human in him might be "clothed upon" with the divine, and his human body be only a willing, ready instrument to interpret and decipher the divine thoughts and purposes of his Father to the world. "My kingdom is not of this world," but also his wisdom was not of this world, it was the wisdom which is from above; his power was not of this world. He came not only to save us from our sins, but to establish the divine presence, power and wisdom of God in a yielded human nature; not "unclothed, but clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up of life." Therefore "with righteousness shall he judge the poor, and reprove with equity for the meek upon earth." It is a righteousness which he receives in order to execute it. Give the King, "thy judgments, O God, and thy righteousness unto the King's Son." Thus equipped, "he shall judge thy people with righteousness," a righteousness received, "and thy poor with judgment."

"And he shall smite the earth with the rod of his mouth, and with the breath of his lips shall he slay the wicked." How little we know the real fully believed in by his people! God can only trust a "completely empty and subject spirit to convey that Word which was mighty to create in the first days of our world, mighty to raise a dead Lazarus, and as mighty to slay a lying Ananias and Sapphira. Many an unripe soul has attempted to handle the mighty power of the Word of God, by pronouncing it over the sick or the possessed, but the Word of God can never be subject to the will of man; the will of man must be subject to the Word—then God can use him as his instrument. As long as any instrument is self-conscious, so long as he is not entirely yielded to the Lord, and just so long is he unfitted to be the Lord's instrument in doing his mightiest works.

"And righteousness shall be the girdle of his loins, and faithfulness the girdle of his reins." When Jesus reigns, truth and uprightness shall flourish. In our days, in almost every country, business is carried on by a system of deceit and intrigue. Sin is winked at, the trouble, annoyance and expense of prosecuting those who are engaged in corrupting the morals of business men, hinders many from attempting it, and thus sin is perpetuated and flourishes unchecked. And when, from conscientious motives, some may be bold enough to put the law in motion against such offenders, they sometimes find, to their cost, that money and influence can do more to hinder justice than a just cause can do to promote it. A mightier power is wanting; an eye which sees from above, a hand which moves from above, the King is needed in his kingdom. "In his days shall the righteous flourish," while in these days it is the wicked who flourish.

With the reign of Christ,

The Effects of the Fall

shall be reversed. Now the wolf destroys the lamb, but then "the wolf shall dwell with the lamb." Jesus is "the Lamb of God," he calls his people to be as "lamb among wolves." As the Lamb of God, he conquered. By dying for his murderers, and praying for his murderers, he conquered them, and their very captain declared: "Truly this was the Son of God." When the wolf shall dwell with the lamb, the lamb shall disarm the wolf, the greatest shall be the strongest, "not by might nor by power, but by my spirit, saith the Lord." No doubt in the animal world, when Jesus reigns, there shall be an actual fulfilment of this prophecy. But, even now, in the kingdom of God which is within or among us, in the hearts and lives which are subject to him, it is the lamb spirit which prevails over every other spirit. Those who learn to "endure grief, suffering wrongfully," those who have forgotten how to retaliate, are always superior to, always mightier than those who attempt to injure them. The cow and bear, the leopard and the kid, the calf and the young lion—mutual companions—shall, in the new state of things, be in perfect accord. Then the serpent itself shall be harmless, and a little child shall be able to lead these beasts of prey—A little child! "Except ye be converted and become as little children, ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven," for in that kingdom, whosoever is like a little child shall be the greatest. How little men understand the true principles of Christ's kingdom! Man values strength, self-assertion, power of resistance, the lion spirit: Jesus values weakness, nothingness, a yielding spirit, the lamb, the little child.

While he tarries, he is receiving unto himself a kingdom, and his people on earth, through crosses, afflictions, persecutions, trials of patience, fellowship with his sufferings, are being educated for his kingdom. "They shall in all thy holy mountain." This is the spirit of his kingdom; not offensive, not hurtful, but gentle, spreading a healing, salutary influence around. And then, when he reigns, and the opposition of Satan is stopped, and he shall be bound for a thousand years (Rev. 20 : 2), then "the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea." Numbers of God's children believe that, through the preaching of the Gospel, in the present dispensation, this object shall be attained. But the Lord and his disciples distinctly call us to watch for his coming, when his angels "shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend and they that do iniquity," (Matt. 13 : 41), so that the world cannot be first converted. He tells us "one shall be taken, and another left" (Luke 17 : 34-37)—thus all will not be ready—and calls us to watch and pray always that we "may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass," that great tribulation when he shall come to "take vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ." God is now taking out from the Gentiles a people for his name, a Bride for the Lamb, who shall reign with him in his kingdom, and judge the world and the angels. When his Bride "hath made herself ready," then will be the marriage of the Lamb, and the great tribulation, precursory to his reign on earth with his Bride. "If we suffer, we shall also reign with him in his kingdom." Oh to be found faithful!

LESSON POINTS.

Especially Adapted to the Requirements of the Desk.

IN verses 6 and 7 the prophet illustrates the peace that will result when the prophecy of our Golden Text shall have become an accomplished fact. Strife, envy, jealousy and cruelty will then cease and those once afflicted with evil natures will no more do evil deeds. The question that most naturally suggests itself to every true disciple of our blessed Lord and Master is, "What can I do to bring about this reign of Peace and Love?"

Before the days of the Union Pacific Railroad thirty New Englanders went out to settle in the Western wilderness. For some years previous they had been in the habit of meeting occasionally at each others houses to talk over their duties to God and man in all simplicity of heart. Their library was the Gospel, their priesthood the inward light. Rich in spiritual culture, with the volume of the Prince of Peace in their hand and with hearts open to his influence, this little band started for the far West. They were industrious and frugal and all things prospered under their hands. But soon wolves came near the fold, in the shape of reckless, unprincipled adventurers, believing in force and cunning, who acted according to their creed.

This colony of practical Christians spoke of their depredations in terms of gentlest remonstrance and repaid them with unvarying kindness. They went farther. They openly announced "you may do us what evil you choose, we will return nothing but good." Lawyers came into the neighborhood and offered their services to settle disputes. They answered "we have no need of you; as neighbors, we receive you in the most friendly spirit, but for us your occupation has ceased to exist." "What will you do if rascals burn your barns and steal your harvests?" "We will return good for evil; we believe this is the highest truth and therefore the best expediency." When the rascals heard this they considered it a marvelous good joke and did many provoking things, which to them seemed witty. Bars were taken down in the night, and cows let into the cornfield. The Christians repaired the damage as well as they could, put the cows in the barn, and at twilight drove them gently home, saying: "Neighbor, your cows have been in my field, I have fed them well during the day, but I could not keep them all night, lest the children should suffer for the want of milk." If this was fun, they who planned the joke found no heart to laugh at it. By degrees a visible change came over these troublesome neighbors. They ceased to cut off horses' tails and break the legs of poultry. Rude boys would say to a younger brother "don't throw that stone, Bill; when I killed a chicken last week, didn't they send it to mother, because they thought that chicken broth would be good for sick Mary? I should think you would be ashamed to throw stones at chickens." Thus was evil overcome with good, till not one was found to do them wilful injury. Years passed on and saw them thriving in worldly substance beyond their neighbors, yet beloved by all.

After ten years the time grew near for the government sale of the land and though the fever of land speculation ran high, and acres brought fabulous prices, the Christian colonists offered a nominal figure for their farms and in all that crowd of reckless, selfish speculators not one had the heart to bid above them; for their neighbors were busy begging and expostulating, "Don't bid on these lands. These men have been working hard on them for ten years. They never did harm to man or brute. They are always ready to do good for evil and they are a blessing to this neighborhood. It would be a sin and a shame to bid on their lands. Let them go at the government price." Truly the wisest political economy lies folded up in the maxims of the Prince of Peace.

A little child shall lead them. While this does not mean that a child shall lead others into the kingdom of God, yet such is frequently the case and for the encouragement of activity in this direction, a story told by Mr. Moody in an evangelistic service may prove acceptable.

I remember a man out West who twenty-eight years ago could not read. He was living on the outskirts of Illinois, and all his time was spent in hunting, fishing, and other like pursuits. His little child was a Sunday School scholar, and when she had learned to read, she begged her father to accompany her to school. She finally one Sunday succeeded in getting him there, and when he saw how the children could read, while he could not, he was greatly ashamed of himself. And though he had made up his mind not to go there again, his wife and daughter persuaded him and he went there and got converted. He learned to read, and unlearned as he was, and though he had an impediment in his speech, he went on persevering until he mastered it, and now he is one of the most active, untiring and successful workers in the cause of God in America.

He has positively established 1180 Sabbath Schools in the States of Illinois, Ohio, Missouri, Indiana and the Territories. He mounts his Sabbath School horse which he calls "Robert Raikes" and when he comes to a new settlement, out of the way of civilization, as it were, he asks permission to start a Sabbath School, and he gathers the parents and children together, and talks to them until the tears trickle down their cheeks, and they all say, "Yes, we will have a Sunday School."

Then he sets to work, and gets teachers and a superintendent, and so the work goes on, and in the vicinity of scores of these schools, churches have sprung up, whose spires pointing heavenward, may be seen dotting the sky line along the Western prairies. And that is all the work of one individual man, who was first won over to it through the influence and example of a little child.

A HOME TESTIMONY.

AN unexpected testimony of a convincing kind was recently given at a meeting in Japan by a physician who was not a Christian. The incident is reported in a letter to the Independent by Rev. A. D. Hall who is laboring in Japan and who says: "A Christian woman, the wife of a physician, who recently moved into a new neighborhood, hearing that a missionary was to preach in a town ten miles distant, walked over to attend the services and to invite a visit to her village. He went the following night and was greeted by a good audience. The husband of this lady bought a Bible, and began its study. He told his neighbors that if Christianity would do as much for their wives as it had done for his wife and his home, it would be well for them to get all their wives to become Christians. The missionary afterward received an invitation from a Christian physician to visit his place, which was quite a distance back in the mountains from the nearest point where he was accustomed to preach. When the missionary reached there, he found not only a good and interested audience, but also some seven persons who were being instructed by the physician for baptism."

NEGLECTED MONEY.

ONE of the New York banks published a strange advertisement a few days ago. It stated that it had about seventy thousand dollars in its possession which it wanted the owners or their heirs to call for. It printed the names of the owners, who numbered about five hundred. It appears that sums were deposited in the bank, in some cases as far back as 1840, and the depositors have never applied for any portion of these deposits. None of them have been heard of for twenty years. The bankers want to clear their books of these unclaimed accounts, so advertised for information about the depositors. They believe that most of them must be dead and that their heirs are not aware of the money lying in the bank awaiting their demand. They are probably right in this case, but it is not always safe to assume that men are dead or ignorant when they do not apply for what they might have for the asking. God promises inestimable blessings to those who seek them at his hands, yet even Christians often neglect to avail themselves of the offer, and have not because they ask not. (James 4:2.)

A TELEGRAPHIC INTERRUPTION.

TELEGRAPHIC communication between New York and Baltimore, Md., was interrupted during the busiest part of the day on Dec. 11. The operators in the Western Union Building in New York were busy sending stock quotations and orders to buy and sell shares, when suddenly a peculiar noise in the instruments indicated that something was wrong. After several fruitless attempts to use the wires the chief operator was sent for. After examination he pronounced the trouble to be due to an injury to the wires somewhere between the two cities. The finely-adjusted mechanism used for sending simultaneous messages was taken off and the wires were tested. They proved to be in good working order, but when the instrument was replaced the defect was again present. Messages were delayed and the case became serious. Electricians were summoned and the instrument carefully examined. Then the cause of the trouble was discovered. A small Croton bug was found on that part of the instrument which regulates the passage of the electric current from the dynamo to the wire in such a way as to connect with its fore and hind legs the positive and negative currents of the battery which are necessarily separated by insulation. The bug was dead, of course, and the current of 250 volts had fairly glued it to the metal, thereby forming a conductor and temporarily interrupting business between New York and Baltimore for more than half an hour. It was a ridiculously insignificant cause for a suspension of communications so important. But great results often proceed from trifling causes. It is so in the spiritual world. What we erroneously term little sins frequently interrupt the communion of the Christian with his Heavenly Father, and if not repented of and abandoned lead to alienation. (Isa 59:2.)

LEFT AMONG SAVAGES.

A PRESS dispatch from Randolph, Mass., says that a letter has been received there from Capt. William Gooding, whose vessel foundered at sea near Pozeat, one of the Caroline Islands. He says that he and the crew took to the one boat on board and made for the nearest land. As the boat neared the shore about thirty canoes came to meet it. In each canoe were two savages almost naked and armed with long knives. They surrounded the boat and, raising their knives menacingly, compelled the sailors to give them their coats and other garments. The boat was then dragged to the shore and the sailors expected that they would be killed and eaten. A great crowd of women and children gathered about them regarding them with curiosity. The men did not know what was about to happen to them. Their suspense ended when a man, half clothed like the others, pushed his way through the crowd and addressed them in English. He told them he was an Englishman by birth. He had come out many years ago to represent a firm of dealers in cocoanuts. He had been forgotten and for more than four years no vessel had come to the island. He had by that time lost his desire to return. The savages had been kind to him and he had become a savage like them, adopting their habits and ways of life. He told them not to be alarmed. No evil would happen to them and in a day or two he would help them to leave the island. He kept his word. The sailors were cared for; well treated and fed, and in a short time the Englishman bought enough canoes from the natives to transport the party to another island, from which they were rescued by the missionary schooner, Morning Star. The Englishman did himself less than justice in saying that he had become a savage like the others. If he had been really a savage he would not have succored the shipwrecked sailors, but would have plundered them as the savages did and as men do among ourselves when they have opportunity. Many a man clad in the garments of civilization and surrounded by the elegances of life shows by his unconcern for the sufferings of the poor, by his oppressions of employees whose poverty places them in his power, and by his delight in inflicting pain on persons who dare not resent it, that he is a savage at heart. We are coming to the perception that the difference between a savage and a Christian is in the heart not in the dress. (James 2:13-17.)

THE NEW IRON BRICKS.

A SCIENTIFIC journal devotes considerable space to the description of a new device recently perfected by a German manufacturer which promises to revolutionize the building trade. It is nothing less than the substitute of a hollow iron shell for the ordinary clay brick or block of stone. As described, the shell is so thin that the brick weighs less than one made of clay, and a wall may be built of it without the use of mortar, nor is any skilled labor required in laying them, the upper and lower sides of the bricks being provided with grooves and projecting ribs which fit into each other easily and perfectly, of necessity insuring great strength; there are also circular openings in the upper sides of each brick, arranged so as to receive projections on the lower side of that which is placed above it, and as one of these projections is hook-shaped, a solid hold is thus secured. After the wall is built it is covered with paint, which closes all the cracks, renders the construction air-tight, as well as prevents any rusting. The manufacturers claim that a building so constructed will be more durable than one built of stone or brick and better fitted to resist fire. The novel feature, however, seems to be the substitution of the iron connections for the mortar or cement hitherto used. Each iron brick clings to its neighbor instead of being attached to it by another material. There should be this close vital union between the members of the Church of Christ which the Apostle compares to "a building fitly framed together," but with them the tie that binds each to the other is their common love of Jesus. (Eph 2:21.)

A WEDDING TOUR IN A STREET-CAR.

A BUSINESS man in Philadelphia who uses the Seventh Street cable cars in going to and from his office noticed a bright and pretty young lady occupying the forward seat in the car one morning recently. She was alone, but she seemed very happy and contented. Indeed, the pleasure visible on her face so impressed her fellow-traveller that the recollection of it recurred to him several times that day. When he returned in the evening he saw the lady on the same car and in the same place near the gripman. He was surprised at the coincidence, but he was still more surprised the next day to find her there again both going and returning. On the third day the same lady was in the car again and in the same place. He was interested and asked the conductor if he knew her. "Oh, yes," was the reply, and the man laughed. "Jim, that's the gripman, has been getting married, and she's his wife. It is two weeks ago now and she has spent the best part of her time on the car. Queer thing love is, isn't it?" An inquiry of the gripman elicited the further facts that when he was married he proposed taking a week or two off for a wedding trip and had saved some money for the purpose. But the wife would not have it. "We'll put that aside for a rainy day," she said. "I should have no pleasure in a trip except in being with you and I'll come and ride with you on the car." The husband thought she would find it dull and cold, but she protested that she should enjoy it if he were there with her; and she had her way. The husband has reason to congratulate himself. A wife whose idea of a happy place is a place where her husband is, must love him very sincerely. That is the kind of love due to Christ from his bride—the Church. In thinking of heaven her heart rejoices, not in the thought of streets paved with gold, but in the thought that her Lord is there. (Phil. 1:23.)

A REMARKABLE WATER SYSTEM.

A RECENTLY published work on Morocco gives an interesting description of Fez, one of its chief cities which has 100,000 inhabitants. The strangest feature of the city is its water supply. Fez stands on the bank of a river which rises in the hills on the south-west and, if not interfered with, would flow past the city on through a valley to the north to join the great river Sebu. But the Sultan's engineers have devised an extensive system of canals which strike the river above the city and divert its waters so that they run through the city. From the canals run hundreds of small channels which carry the water to every house and garden in the city. A traveller says: "There is no city in the world, with the exception of Rome and perhaps Vienna, which has so magnificent a water system. The brooks gurgle through every garden and field. The city has other blessings, too, for its climate is glorious, the soil of the country round is very fruitful, and the landscape is of surpassing beauty, but the people do not know how to utilize their blessings. Their streets are extremely dirty, their houses are badly ventilated, and they have made insalubrious a town that could be one of the healthiest in the world." That these people do not know how to utilize their blessing of abundant water is evident, as the traveller says, but there is probably a trouble behind that, in their having no desire to know. If some one showed them how to use the water for purposes of ablution they would be no better for it unless they could be induced to love cleanliness. It is so with moral and spiritual purity. God has made abundant provision for it but men do not use it because they do not love righteousness. (John 3:19.)

A DINNER IN A SEWER.

A SUMPTUOUS repast was spread on December 12th, for a party of wealthy and influential men, in one of the strangest places in which such a meal could be eaten. The Board of Works of the city of Brooklyn, N. Y., decided, some months ago, on constructing a gigantic sewer 12,500 feet long and fifteen feet in diameter, which would cost more than a million dollars. Three-fourths of the work was completed last week and the Mayor of the city invited a party of friends to go down with him and walk through the tunnel. It was lighted up for the occasion and the party walked through from one end to the other. About half way through, at a point where the sewer is more than fifty feet below the surface, they found a table spread and, on the invitation of the Mayor, sat down to dine. A luxurious meal was eaten, congratulatory speeches were made, and the party, delighted with the strange trip, returned to the light of day. Inappropriate as the place was for an ordinary meal the guests must have recognized its appropriateness for this particular meal. It was a feast in celebration of accomplished work and it fittingly took place on the scene of the achievement. The time is coming when the greatest achievement of the ages—the completion of Christ's church—will be celebrated by a feast and it will similarly be celebrated in the midst of the church at the marriage-supper of the Lamb. (Rev. 19:7-9.)

FORTY COMING WONDERS.

A NEW and enlarged edition has been issued of Rev. M. Baxter's famous work on the unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible entitled Forty Coming Wonders. It contains 540 pages and fifty full-page illustrations of the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. In an appendix is a resume of the opinions of eminent expositors of prophecy, ancient and modern. Price (including postage), seventy-five cents. May be had of Rev. George A. Sparks, 92 Bible House, New York.

THE RAPTURE.

Watchful Believers to be Caught up to Meet Christ at His Coming into the Air.

IN St. Paul's inimitable resurrection-argument (1 Cor. 15), as a kind of interlude appears this declaration: "Behold I show you a mystery; we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump; for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed."

A "mystery" indeed—of supreme sublimity, of incomparable power, of incomparable splendor. Before this spectacle philosophy is silent.

Two Marvellous Events

are blended into one vast wonder. Simultaneously, dead saints spring to life, and living saints are changed. The same "sound" of the "last trump" will at the same instant raise the dead and change the living. One mighty act of the eternal Spirit will reorganize dead dust, and immortalize both dead and living saints. At the fiat of the "archangel's voice" and the "trump of God," without a moment's parleying or an instant's delay, death will surrender, and mortality be swallowed up of life; and the elect of God will stand arrayed in the beauty and glory of deathless being.

But as to the wonderful change. It will be equivalent to resurrection and all that resurrection implies. Though it will not be a spoilage of the grave, it will be deliverance and escape from the reach and power of the grim enemy. The power of the Divine Spirit flashing through every element of being will eliminate from brain and blood, from flesh and bone, from nerve and fibre, from matter and mind, all stain and taint of corruption, all tendency to decay. And more, it will exalt every faculty, power, and element into the dignity symmetry, permanence, and beauty of of perfect and perpetual manhood. Vast the change, and wonderful as vast! Yet leaving each himself in form and feature. Enoch and Elijah are Enoch and Elijah still. Translation glory will efface nothing essential to personal identity and recognition.

Then what? Again we bend our ear to the holy Oracles. They alone can solve this "mystery." Once more the great apostle, filled with the spirit of prophecy, and enraptured by heavenly expectation, exclaims, "For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first; then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air" (1 Thess. 4:16, 17).

The meaning of the expression, "the dead in Christ shall rise first," is made plain by verse 15, which is that the holy dead will be raised before the living saints ascend, so that "we which are alive and remain" "shall not go before them which are asleep," but "shall be caught up together with them." And let it be noted that the translation of the risen and the changed saints is to occur when "the Lord himself shall descend from heaven."

The Mysterious Refuge.

But to what place will they be "caught up?" Paul says, "In—the air." Above the earth, in the region to which the Lord will descend to meet them. For what purpose, and to what place of safety we will let the inspired prophet define. "Come, my people, enter thou into thy chambers, and shut thy doors about thee; hide thyself for a little moment, until the indignation be overpast. For, behold, the Lord cometh out of his place to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity; the earth also shall disclose her blood, and shall no more cover her slain." (Isa. 26:20, 21.)

All is now plain. "The Lord himself will descend from heaven with a shout;" the dead will be raised; the sleeping saints will come forth incorruptible, immortal; the living saints will be changed; then all the righteous will be caught up to a place of safety—into Isaiah's chambers—to meet their Lord, where they will remain till the "indignation be overpast." The indignation can mean nothing else and nothing less than the terrors, punishments and destruction which make up the judgment day—the day of God's wrath upon all the guilty, as described by Christ in Matt. 25:21-46, and by John 6:15-17. If any doubt this, let them read carefully Isaiah 26:20, 21, specially the 21st verse. And when the indignation is finished, the earth and heavens made clean, being purified by fire; then the King, with all his ransomed, will descend with his metropolis, the New Jerusalem, and reign for a thousand years over the earth.

THE ART OF DOING GOOD.

THERE is an art in everything. If, when the harvests are ripe, we should go into the fields, we would find that while one husbandman goes over the field, cutting down the grain with great exhaustion, halting at the end of the first swath before he has strength again to strike into the grain, another man goes for two or three hours without halting, save to sharpen his instrument—goes from one side of the field to the other without any special fatigue. What is the difference? In the one case the man knows how to swing the scythe, and in the other he does not. One man will go out with a fishing apparatus that has cost him fifty dollars, and catch absolutely nothing the livelong day; while another man, with an apparatus prepared with his own jack-knife, will catch so many of the spoils of the water that his basket will scarcely hold them. What is the difference? In the one case the man knows how to fish; in the other he does not.

We acknowledge that there is an art in everything. Is there any art in religion? Why is it that one man starts out in the Christian life and makes rapid advancement? He seems to walk across the field, going from one degree of grace to another, getting stronger and mightier in the Christian life; with no especial drawback, his misfortunes and his trials becoming his coadjutors, so that at the end of thirty years he can look back and see that he has made one long, complete triumph; while another man will be thirty years in the Church of God and achieve nothing, standing where he was at the start, or having retreated, not really having so much faith or usefulness as in the first year. Why is it that the one man goes ahead and the other goes back? Is there any art in religion? There is. No man gets on in the Christian life by accident. There is no such thing as hap-hazard. If a man advance in the Christian life rapidly and mightily, it is because he employs certain means and does certain things in order to gain those achievements.

PRAYER WITH CLOSED DOORS.

THE one great secret of advancement in religious experience is secret prayer. It is very easy to come into a public assemblage, and stimulated by the hearty singing and by the cheerful faces of scores and hundreds of God's people, to bow our heads and lift our hearts in prayer; but to have some secret place where, day by day, either at morning, or at noon, or at night, we kneel down before God, no one in the whole world listening, and to do that thing day after day, and month after month, and year after year, and for scores of years—that is not so easy a thing to do. It wants some perseverance, some high appreciation of duty, some grand Christian determination, some Almighty help.

No one can pray in public his whole prayer. Take the best man in the world, and let him rise up before God in public assemblage, and tell all his temptations and sorrows and annoyances and grievances and deficits, and he would clear the room in ten minutes. People would say: "We didn't come into the house of prayer to-night to have our ears and hearts insulted." We knew an excellent Christian man who had the habit, in prayer-meeting, of telling the most astounding things of what he used to do and where he used to go. We all believed in him as a useful man; but we all wished he would not go so much into particulars. It edified no Christian ear, it advanced no Christian heart. And yet there is a place where a man ought to be able to tell everything to his God, to review all his past life, to count up all the wonderful deliverances, and take all the annoyances and the grievances of the present moment before God; but if he has no closet of secret prayer, where shall he do that? There is no such thing as a stalwart Christian character except that which grows in private, and which starts from secret communion with God—an out-and-out unlimited utterance such as a man cannot give in a public religious assemblage.

LOOK AT HOME.

THERE are a great many Christians now who spend their chief time in looking after others while their own vineyard goes to waste. They are raising very fine grapes on the other side of the fence, but the property does not belong to them, nor the grapes. We know Christians who are lean as skeletons in religious experience, who are running hither and thither looking after Sunday-schools, calling conventions, attending meetings. They are in everlasting ferment about other people, but have no anxiety about themselves. They cut the wool off somebody else's sheep, and spin it on somebody else's wheel, and weave it in somebody else's loom, for somebody else's back. Meanwhile their own souls are shivering to death. So there are women busy collecting money for benevolent institutions and managing public affairs, while their own children go with their faces unwashed, and stockings undarned, and minds uneducated, and souls unsaved. Busy everywhere but in their own vineyard.

Now, the first thing for one to do is, to take care of his or her own heart. How was it that the old saints, with less opportunity than we have, were better men? They had more time for contemplation. Christians now seldom sit down to think. It is drive, and push, and pull. Their only quiet time is when they are on an express train going at fifty miles an hour, watch in hand, wondering why they don't go sixty. Just before communion they feel called upon for especial self-examination, and so take the ten minutes in which they are walking to church to think what miserable offenders they have been. Now you have no right to give so much time to your neighbors' crops that you let your own suffer. Beside, if our own piety be thin, our work will be inefficient. If we have been much with Christ, and have deep personal experiences, we will do more good in one month than with a shallow experience we could do in ten years. One-half the Christian effort of to-day is mere gab—the world sees straight through it; while some man, who says but little, yet feels much, gets hold of the heart of an audience, and rouses, and melts, and subdues, and agonizes it at will. Rickety and unsafe machinery always makes a great racket. Christians seeking no advancement in personal piety are often very demonstrative, as steamboats at the wharf blowing off steam are so noisy you cannot hear yourself speak. A man of deep religious experiences is always effective. We care not how poor his voice is, or how uncomely his countenance, or how awkward his gestures, or how shabby his clothes, or how lame his grammar.

BRIEF NOTES.

Complaints of irregular delivery of "The Christian Herald" have reached us from a number of subscribers in a certain section. These complaints have been investigated and the irregularity has been discovered. There will be no further trouble hereafter.

Rev. Dr. David J. Burrell is giving a series of addresses to young men in Association Hall, New York, every Sunday afternoon in December at 3 o'clock.

Lady Henry Somerset delivered an earnest address in Lafayette Avenue Presbyterian Church, on Sunday evening, Dec. 13. She pleaded the claims of the poor on the Church of Christ for physical and spiritual beneficence.

Rev. Joseph Norwood, Agent of the American Bible Society in Caracas, reports a gratifying circulation of the Scriptures, which demands another large consignment for his work in Venezuela. He has been laid aside with a severe attack of fever but is now recovering.

A recent census of the Protestant churches in Cleveland, O., shows that there are 142 Protestant churches in the city with an aggregate membership of 23,289 and a seating capacity of 71,091. Ten wards of the city furnish one-half of the church members while the other half are distributed over thirty wards. The percentage is four times larger in the wealthy wards than in the poorer wards.

Contributions in aid of the Church at Kingston, Pa., whose finances have been crippled by the fire which threw its members out of work, and for which an appeal was published in this journal on Dec. 2d, have been sent by several subscribers. They are as follows: From Jersey City, N. J., $2; W. S. Larimore, Cannerville, Ind., $5; W. Hopkins (no address), $1; W. G. Henderson, Pittsburgh, $1.

Dr. L. W. Munhall commenced a series of services on Dec. 6th at Muskegon, Mich. The first services were held in the Methodist Episcopal Church. Several denominations are joining in the work and a corps of workers from the various churches are helping the Evangelist in the singing and in the inquiry room. At the afternoon services for young people over one hundred expressed concern about their souls and asked for prayer.

Pastor C. H. Spurgeon writes as follows from Mentone to his church in London: "I cannot say that I am better, but then I am not worse, although I have been kept indoors by days of rain. I am always confidently hopeful of complete recovery, and therefore I faint not in heart even when the body is overcome with weakness. In compensation for these dumb Sabbaths the Lord will give me years of free utterance of his Word. So I trust and so you pray."

Contributions to the Fund for supplying colored ministers in the South with this journal have been received since our last acknowledgment to the amount of $9.50. They are from: Argyle P. E. I., $7.50; China Me., $1.00; Olean, N. Y., $1.00. As a large number of these subscriptions expire with the end of this year we shall be glad to hear from pastors who desire to participate in the benefits of the fund during next year, either those who have been receiving the paper or those who have not had it and desire it.

Rev. C. H. Yatman's meetings at Williamsport, Pa., increase in interest and usefulness from day to day. The local journals say that no such period of religious activity has ever been known there since the city was founded. On Dec. 6 the First Baptist Church was filled at half-past six in the morning by eager throngs to commence the day with prayer. At nine o'clock there was a meeting in Mulberry St. Church for girls only. At half-past ten a meeting in the Court House. Later was a union meeting in the First Presbyterian Church. Thence Mr. Yatman went to the Second Presbyterian Church, where he held a men's mass meeting. A women's mass meeting was held at the same time in the First Baptist Church, where Mrs. Kress spoke and sang. Then followed a boys' meeting in St. Paul's Lutheran Church, and at night the Evangelist preached to over twelve hundred people in the First Presbyterian Church. In the course of the day nearly five hundred persons made profession of faith.

A GOOD PROOF.

JUST try it." "Try what?" Why, reading Beale or Bacon, Spenser or Shakspeare to a poor lost soul in sin, for the purpose of lifting them out of the sloughs of despond, or the darkness of despair. You who put so much dependence on scholasticism and scholarship, just try a bit of it on some wayward boy or fallen girl. You will read till you are blind, and they will be no better; but now try something else. Take the old Bible, and go to any place or any one you please—for Light don't quarrel with the quality of darkness it has to deal with—open up first at the Safety Psalm, the ninety-first, then take Luke fifteen, and you won't have gotten to the third parable, before your hearer will feel a mighty tug at his soul, and if you will keep right on, the power of the word of God will lift that one higher than an Angel—to be a child of God.

How I would like to get ten thousand preachers next Sabbath to throw away, for once at least, their well-spun sermons, and go in their pulpits, after a week of prayer, open up the Scriptures to 1. Peter 1: 23, and from there to the end of the chapter, begin to expound and preach.

Peter's experience at Pentecost would soon be repeated.

That memorable sermon that got three thousand converts was nearly all Words of God, not words or thoughts of Peter.

Power.

This the soul-winner must have; not only power with God, but with men. We had better limp like Jacob with power, than to walk straight and not have it. It comes from above. It is the gift of God. When endued with it there is a holy enthusiasm that fills the soul. Wisdom and knowledge fill the brain. There is no such word as fail to the man thus baptized with the Holy Ghost.

How to Get It.

First, the heart must be right, for the Lord will not hear us if we regard iniquity. Next, there must be a great desire for it, which desire must have for its object the salvation of souls and the glory of God.

Then there must be prayer—continued prayer—prevailing prayer—believing prayer—a wrestling as in olden days. To the one who thus comes and waits in faith there will be given power from on high, and thousands of souls will be saved.

Oh, reader, above all other blessings seek this; tarry in your closet till you are "Filled with the Spirit."

Power of the Word.

God's Word, not our word, for the sword of the Spirit is the word of God. If wisely aimed there are few who can stand many shots direct from the word of God, given by those whose souls are ablaze with desire for their salvation. Pour in upon the individual, the Sunday-school class, or the small gathering, or the big assembly, the mighty truths of the Bible, and as sure as harvest follows seed-sowing, so sure will this work win men to love our Lord.

The Result.

Such workers cannot help but succeed. Those they meet in the City of Destruction, or find in the pits of death, will respond to "the tug of a mighty soul."

Give us a single hundred fully won men, whose aim and object and purpose are nothing else but to spend and be spent in saving souls, and before a decade has passed every hill-top and valley of all lands will blaze with the electric light of God's presence, and millions of men, redeemed by the blood of the Lamb, having been won through revivals thus kindled, will make the very "mountains and hills break forth before you into singing."

Oh for a company of full-of-faith, dead-in-earnest, thoroughly-awake, constantly-alive, always-at-it, never-give-up, sure-to-win folk, that will now determine to seek the closet of prayer and once and forever give themselves to God for this work. Then secular means will be sanctified to a purpose. Then the iron grip of the will, fixed on "this one thing I do," will, under God, mould, twist and turn various methods, means and opportunities into one channel. Then the worker will create plans or winning men, and the keen sight of his soul will tell him how they are to be used.

RECORD OF THE WEEK.

A Speck of Anglo-Russian War in India—Chinese Inflammatory Placards Against Foreigners—Mr. Russell Sage's Assailant Identified—Canada's New Premier, &c, &c,

GOVERNMENT officials along the border have succeeded in detecting another well-organized plot for the wholesale smuggling of Chinamen into this country from Canada, in violation of the Exclusion Act. They are shipped from Vancouver across the continent by rail to some Canadian port or to the Chinese colony in Toronto. There they take out Canadian certificates of release, if as they had been Canadian citizens, and then they make the effort to smuggle themselves over the line, at some point on the St. Lawrence river. As many as on hundred have been landed on the American side at Brockport, Ont., in a day. In one instance, twelve Chinamen paid $400 to a boatman of taking them across the river. On reaching American soil all are supplied with tickets for New York. Thus far very few arrests have been made but as the secret is now out, it is believed that very little smuggling will be attempted on the St. Lawrence for some time to come. It is asserted that over 10,000 have been brought east by the Canadian Pacific Railroad within the past six months, and that a majority have succeeded in reaching United States territory undetected. Wherever Chinamen have been stopped in transit across by United States officials, the Canadian officials have refused to receive them unless they paid the $50 poll tax, and failing this they have been sent to jail.

Reappearance of the Grip.

OUR Russian visitor of two winters ago, la grippe, has again put in an unwelcome appearance. New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Pittsburg, St. Louis and Denver all report it as prevalent, though not to an alarming extent. In some parts of Connecticut, one-fourth of the population are afflicted. It is milder in form than on the former visit. Several fatal cases have occurred in New York. In Washington, Justices Brown and Lamar of the United States Supreme Court are confined by attacks of the grip, and Governor-elect McKinley is sick at Canton, Ohio. Senator Quay, of Pennsylvania, also had a sharp attack. European countries are also suffering from its ravages and in some—more particularly Austria—it has prostrated both men and cattle. It is accompanied by headache, nausea, dizziness and general lassitude and affects the victim from five to ten days. Among other noted sufferers abroad is Sir John E. Millais, the famous English painter. Archduke Sigismund Leopold Renier, of Austria, expired of the grip at Vienna, where many fatal cases have occurred.

M. de Giers and his Mission.

WHILE Russia is facing the spectre of famine at home, her financial prospects abroad and the future relations of the Czar's government with other European powers are in the hands of the Russian Minister of Foreign Affairs, M. de Giers, who has recently been visiting the various capitals on a diplomatic mission. It has already been told in these columns how his visit to the Italian court and the attempt to entice Italy from the Triple Alliance resulted in failure, how the effort to place the Russian loan signally fell through everywhere save in France, and how his visit to Paris set all Europe to talking of the new relation supposed to be then established between the Republic and the St. Petersburg government. M. de Giers, one of the ablest and most successful diplomats of the century, is far from being the fierce-looking personage one would expect to find in the representative of a despotic power like Russia, the storm-centre of Europe; he is a mild-mannered gentleman of sixty, keen, astute and suave, with something about him that recalls the manner of M. Thiers. He has held many offices of honor and high authority under his royal master, and is to-day regarded in Russia as one of the few intimate advisers of the Emperor. While his recent journey may not have quite fulfilled his own expectations, it is certain that it shook the nerves of Europe considerably. A portrait of M. de Giers is given above.

China and the Foreigners.

SHANGHAI despatches announce that the Chinese government has succeeded in detaching the authors of the inflammatory pamphlet and placards directed against the foreigners, and which were to a great extent the cause of the recent disturbances at Ichang and elsewhere. Eight of the offenders are men of the province of Hunan. It is believed that the anti-foreign riots, in which the native Christians also suffered, were instigated by the hatred of the upper-class Chinese to foreigners. The literati promoted the disturbances by their appeals to the ignorance of the people with stories and placards representing the killing of babies by the foreigners, who were declared to have taken out the eyes and lungs for medicine. These placards and cartoons were freely circulated and aroused a storm of indignation among the populace against the "foreign devils," as they denominated the Europeans. One of a number of such illustrations, seen in the towns along the Yangtse-kiang, is reproduced in this column. It shows two foreigners being beaten with rods by Chinese, while a mandarin is superintending the proceeding, and other natives are burning foreign books in a fire-pot in the foreground. Abusive inscriptions cover the top and sides of the cartoon, directed against the foreigners and their doctrines. Beside such placards, a great deal of other literature of the same character has been distributed, mandarins being occasionally among the writers.

Fighting in India.

An event of startling interest, which may be the prelude to the long-expected war between England and Russia on the Indian frontier, occurred recently near Gilgit, a point on the Pamir frontier, and not far distant from the new boundary line established by Russia. The British agency at Gilgit, which was garrisoned by native troops, was captured by a force of frontier tribesmen from Hunza and Nagar, and the Chalt fort held by the British fell into their hands. A strong force of British troops under Col. Durand started for Gilgit and defeated the enemy, recapturing Fort Chalt and inflicting considerable loss on the tribesmen. Several English officers, including the commander, were wounded in the engagement. It is contended that the tribesmen were instigated by Russian agents, as Russia has for some time past had a military expedition hovering on the frontier of British India, the object being to put forward a territorial claim to a large tract of land now held as neutral, and which includes the whole of the Pamir region. There is general expectation of renewed fighting and the English are pushing forward a strong force to prevent further Russian encroachments. The beginning of the present trouble was what is known as the Younghusband incident which occurred last summer, when Captain Younghusband, a British agent, who had encountered a Russian outpost on the neutral ground, sent word back to Gilgit. He was arrested by the Russian commanding officer, Col. Yanoff, and compelled to retire. Another English officer, Capt. Davison, was similarly treated. Since these events, the English have been rapidly strengthening their position at Gilgit and have made a military road leading to the Pamir frontier. The "roof of the sky" is the singular and picturesque name given by natives of Upper India to the Pamir. Believing that Russia has an eye upon it, a British force was sent out some time ago to the Pamir country and after encountering many hardships, reached the coveted territory only to find it an inhospitable and barren waste of mountains and rocky gorges, almost valueless for military purposes. Captain Younghusband, whose portrait is given above, in a recent letter, says the rigorous weather makes the occupation of the Pamir impossible. Moreover the passes between Ferghana, where the last Russian outpost is, and Gilgit, the most advanced British outpost, range from 11,000 to 14,000 feet in height. There are three of these passes on the way to Lake Karakul, and the tremendous Gargil pass down into Gilgit. But Russia has the reputation of making progress in the face of great natural obstacles and it would not be surprising to hear that the Czar's armies, with the aid of their tribesmen allies, had surmounted those of the Pamir in the desire to gain a foothold in Northern India.

CAPT. YOUNGHUSBAND.

Mr. Sage's Assailant.

ALTHOUGH the nine days' wonder excited by the attempt on Mr. Russell Sage's life by a dynamiter has now subsided, there is still a great deal of interest in the case, in view of the difficulty of identifying the man who threw the bomb. After several mistaken identifications, the dynamiter has been identified as Henry L. Norcross, a note-broker of Boston, who seems to have become insane recently. His head was identified by friends and his clothing by his tailor, and even his parents were compelled, reluctantly, to acquiesce in the identification. Norcross had brooded over a great business project for some time, and had repeatedly attempted to interest capitalists. He is said to have left a letter on his desk addressed to his mother, informing her that he was going to New York and that unless he returned within a given time he would not return alive. His parents are completely prostrated by the blow.

Canada's New Premier.

It is not generally to be expected that the official successor of a great statesman, for half a generation a leader in his party, could at the outset command a large share of popular approval. The Hon. John Joseph Caldwell Abbott, the new Canadian Premier, however, seems to be an exception. Sir John A. Macdonald's successor has had as useful a public career as any living Canadian statesman. While a young lawyer of twenty-eight, he and a few friends drafted the famous annexation manifesto which is still remembered by Canadian politicians. His career as a lawyer was not exceptionally brilliant, but his public record as a whole, is an admirable one. For the last four years he has been the leader in the Dominion Senate, where his parliamentary abilities and thorough business methods have been highly appreciated. Premier Abbott, whose portrait is given on this page is yet in his prime, vigorous intellectually and physically, and apparently equipped for many years of active and valuable service.

HON. J. J. C. ABBOTT.

Work in Congress.

Much interest has been displayed during the week at Washington in anticipation of the announcement by Speaker Crisp of the Chairmanships of Committees, and the rivalry for control by the leading committees has been unusually lively. It is generally understood that Mr. Springer will be chosen for the Ways and Means. Hon. W. S. Holman, of Indiana, will be appointed Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. In the Senate, the assignment of Committees has resulted in placing Mr. Hoar at the head of the Judiciary Committee; Mr. Quay, Library Committee; Mr. Cameron, Naval and Indian Affairs; Mr. Cul- lom, Interstate Commerce; Mr. Hawley, Military Affairs; Mr. Plumb, Public Lands; Mr. Allison, Appropriations; Mr. Paddock, Agriculture; Mr. Wolcott, Civil Service and Mr. Sherman, Foreign Relations. The rush of new bills introduced in both houses has been continuous since the opening session. One of the measures introduced in the Senate (by Mr. Gallinger, Rep., N. H.) prohibits all persons not citizens from holding office under the government.

NEWS NOTES.

Six hundred and twelve bills were introduced in Congress during the first day's session.

A "Penny Postage" bill has been introduced in the U. S. Senate by Mr. Cullom.

Emperor Kwangsu of China has decided to study English, against the protests of his advisers.

The agitation for the removal of Gen. Grant's remains to Arlington Cemetery, Washington, has been renewed.

Italy is likely to reconsider her determination not to be represented at the Chicago Fair. Local Committees are at work in Rome and government aid will be asked.

Another disastrous gale, causing great loss to shipping, has visited the English coast. Many marine underwriters have been ruined by their losses this season, owing to the unprecedented storms.

Lieutenant Mansfield, an aeronaut, made a balloon ascension at Bombay, India, lately, and while four hundred feet in air the balloon burst. Mansfield struck the ground with terrific force, being instantly killed.

A great wind storm in California inflicted widespread damage in the San Francisco and San Gabriel Valleys last week. Buildings were wrecked, cars derailed and orange groves ruined. Several churches were badly damaged.

Baron Hirsch, the millionaire philanthropist, has purchased 3,001 square leagues of land in the northern part of the Argentine Republic, for his Jewish colonization project. This makes him the largest individual landowner in the world.

A revolt against the new Peixotto government in Brazil is reported. In a fight at Campos, 150 miles from Rio Janeiro, ten men were killed and thirty wounded. Business in Brazil is in a deplorable condition and many failures are threatened.

Germany has granted several important tariff concessions to American products, to take effect February 1, 1892. These include a reduction of 30 per cent. on wheat; 30 on rye; 37 1-2 on oats; 20 on corn; 15 on butter, and 15 on pork.

The Chinese Imperial troops, under Gen. Nich, have won another victory over the rebels in Manchuria. An Imperial order has been issued ordering the beheading of all the captured rebels who were implicated in the massacres of native Christians.

Sixteen of the crew of the lumber-laden steamer Maggie Ross, were drowned and the steamer was found adrift and deserted on the Pacific near Coos Bay. The bark Gen. Butler, from Port Gamble, Wash., foundered off Cape Arago, on the Pacific and nine of the crew were lost.

President Montt, of Chili, has sent a communication to President Harrison, referring to that portion of the latter's annual Message to Congress which relates to the Chilean trouble. He declares that Chili has never attempted to evade responsibility for the Baltimore affair, and that President Harrison's message affords the hope that no action will be taken by this government until the Chilean judicial inquiry is concluded.

At a series of fires in Louisville, Ky., $500,000 worth of property was destroyed and eleven lives were lost. Four firemen were buried under falling walls, and six girls employed in the candy factory of F. A. Menn & Co., were burned to death. A member of the firm also perished, and Major Hughes, Chief of the Fire Department was so badly injured at one of the fires that he may not recover.

A GREAT BARGAIN.

"Again, the kingdom of heaven is like unto a merchant-man, seeking goodly pearls: Who, when he had found one pearl of great price, went and sold all that he had, and bought it."—Matthew 13:45, 46.

A MERCHANT endeavors to trade so as to make a profit. Whether he deals in pearls or in grain, he does not hope to obtain riches by labor. He leaves that to those who eat their bread by the sweat of their face. He tries to get his by the sweat of his brain. He is dependent not so much upon labor as upon knowledge, upon skill, upon the advantage which superior acquaintance with the article which he deals in gives to him. Now, this merchantman is, at the very commencement, in some measure a picture of the seeker after Christ. Christ and his salvation are not to be earned; they are not to be procured as the result of labor. But Christ is to be had by knowledge. What saith the Scripture? "By his knowledge shall my righteous servant justify many?" that is, through their knowing Christ they become justified.

I shall not, however, enlarge upon this analogy, but proceed at once to speak of the merchant in this parable; for here we have a fit emblem of many who lay hold on Christ and find him to be their all in all. Let us watch this merchant while he is doing four things; first, seeking; then, finding; then selling out; and, fourthly, buying again.

I. Then, we shall watch him while

He is Seeking.

"The kingdom of heaven is like unto a merchantman seeking goodly pearls." It is different from the man we read of just now who, by accident, discovered a treasure while he was in the field. He was looking for something else, and came upon the treasure. That is the man whom God saves, though he was heretofore indifferent and careless. This is a person of a nobler sort. He is of a higher grade of mind—of altogether different mental constitution. He is seeking goodly pearls—something good, not exactly seeking the one pearl of great price, for at first he does not know about it; but, still, he is seeking pearls, and he comes upon one pearl in his seeking.

Now, notice about him, as a seeker, that he has his mind aroused and engaged. He is thinking about something—thinking about pearls. His heart is occupied with his business. His energies are thrown into it. All his thoughts are in the direction of precious stones. Oh that we could wake men up to exercise the faculty of thinking, and then to direct, to regulate, and to control their thoughts! But thinking is an occupation that a great many persons altogether dislike. Oh that men were wise, that they were thoughtful!

An Object in Life.

Equally evident is it that he had a fixed, definite object. He had given himself to pearl-hunting, and pearl-hunting was to be the one object of his life. If you had met him, and said, "What are you seeking?" he would have answered in a moment, "I am seeking good pearls: have you any to sell me?" He would have been sure to have the answer ready to hand. But ask many a man whom you meet with, "Sir, what are you living for?" he would, perhaps, tell you what his trade or what his profession might be; but if you pressed him with the question, "What is the main object of life?" he would not like to say that he was living only to enjoy himself—seeking his own pleasure.

An Active Search.

The merchant was seeking goodly pearls. He did not open a shop, and say, "Pearls bought here if anybody likes to bring them;" but he went forth in quest of them. How far he travelled I do not know; but the Oriental trader frequently goes immense distances. You may meet at Nijni-Novgorod, in the south of Russia, with traders who have been all round the globe seeking what they want—men who do not always travel by railway, but who will walk any distance to obtain the very article on which they have set their minds, and in which they deal. Distance seems with them to be no object. Ah, and when a man has got a noble object before him, and says, "Before I die, I will accomplish something that shall be right and true and beneficial to my fellow-men," he will face hardships that would baffle his fellows. I pray God that he may have the perseverance to carry that out, and that he may say, "If there is anything to be done that is good and true, I will do it at any hazard, for I am seeking goodly pearls."

Moderate Expectations.

Evidently this merchant went into the business with comparatively moderate expectations. He was seeking pearls. If anybody had said, "Would you like to find a big pearl?" he would have said, "That I would, infinitely better than to find a number of little ones." He hardly hoped for it, and therefore he did not seek it; but, still, he was ready enough to have it if it came in his way. And so, my dear friends, I am speaking of a class of persons—and I hope there may be representatives of them here—who want everything they can get that is good and true. You want to be temperate in all things; you want to have an unsullied character. I recollect that was my own desire, when first I thought of the life that lay beyond me. Before I knew the Lord I used to think, "O that I might be kept from dishonesty, that I might be preserved from falsehood, that I might be kept from a malicious spirit, that I might be right-hearted and true." Those were the pearls that I wanted. I did not know just then that I could find something that would include all these minor pearls and a good deal more.

II. Let us go a stage farther, then, and look at this man's

Finding.

He was buying pearls everywhere. He was hard after pearls; and so it came to pass that he lit upon a pearl that he never hoped to see. It was more than he expected. Ah, I pray God that some here, whose hearts are honestly seeking after that which is right, may find Christ, who has in him more of the spirit of temperance, uprightness, truth, philanthropy than will be found anywhere else.

Certainly this man was in the way of finding a fine pearl if anybody was. He was seeking goodly pearls, not the one pearl; but he was in the pearl line, and so he was likely to discover the best pearl if anybody discovered it. "Being in the way, the Lord met with him," says one of old. Oh, if thou hast desires after that which is right and true and good, I trust that the Lord Jesus will manifest himself to you, and that you will say, "This is the very thing I sought I have longed after it, and here it is."

So this man found all in one. What the value of that pearl was I do not know. The estimate of

is not given. We only know that he thought it worth all that he had; and he went away and sold all that he had that he might buy it. And he evidently thought it worth all the other pearls he had ever been seeking for, because if he spent his all upon that one pearl it would be clear that he must have abandoned henceforth the searching after smaller pearls, since he had no capital left. Well, when a man finds Christ I cannot tell you how much he values him, but this I know, that all the world besides seems nothing to a Christian when he has once found his Lord and Master. "Oh what a Christ have I!" saith he. But he cannot tell how dear—how inconceivably precious—the Christ of God is to his soul.

Concerning this find we must mark next that the man having found it, was resolved that he would have it. Having found the pearl of great price, he did not question whether he should buy it or not. If he had not gone out honestly to seek pearls he would have demurred at the price, but being intent upon pearl finding, he no sooner found this than he said, "I must have that. I can let the little pearls go if you like, but

I Must Have That."

And it is grand when the Lord brings the mind to this. "I see that in Christ there is everything I want—pardon for my sin, cleansing for my nature, grace to maintain my character and to make me perfectly fit for heaven. There is all in Christ that I want, and I must have him. I must have him. It comes to this—at any price—whatever it may cost me, I must and I will have him."

Now, although the parable does not say it in so many words, it is perfectly clear that the person with whom he was dealing was willing to sell. When he had found one pearl of great price he bought it, which he could not have done if the other had not been ready to sell it. Albeit the Lord in his mercy does not sell his grace, but gives it freely, the manner in which he disposes of it is here described under the figure of selling. If you want Christ, you may have him, if you are willing to come to the terms which God lays down. Of this I shall have to speak presently. If you desire this pearl of great price, there is no reason in the world why that pearl should not be yours to-night.

III. Having thus described the seeker, we must go on to describe him

Selling Out.

He sold out all that he had. It had taken him a long time to get it together, and I have no doubt he had much pleasure in the accumulation, but now he has great pleasure in selling. "Buy my farm," he says to one man. "Come buy it." "I don't know that I want to buy farms," says the other. "It is nought: it is nought." "Nevertheless, let us come to terms. I want money, and I must have money." And away went the furniture down in the house, one article after another. They must all go, clear them all out. Away they shall go at the best price they will fetch, but go they must, for he must have the pearl. Well now, Jesus Christ is to be had, but there is a great deal that a man must give up if he is ever to call Christ his own.

"What then," says one, "what am I to give up?" Well, there must be a selling off to-night of a whole mass of old prejudices. Sometimes when the truth as it is in Jesus comes to a man's mind he repels it, because it is so different from what he has learnt ever since he was a child; and the notion is that you had better follow the religion of your parents. But it is a great mercy when a man says, "Now, I understand that Jesus the Son of God has died in the room and place and stead of sinners that believe in him, and I am simply to believe in him, and I shall be saved. I will do it. It is contrary to what I have always been told. I have been led to think that it was my good works which would save me. I have heard that the grace was in the sacrament, but at length I perceive that God teaches in his word that salvation is by faith in Jesus Christ, and I will have it. I will sell my prejudices off. Away they shall go."

What is Sold.

Next to that you must sell off your righteousness. It will not fetch much, but I daresay you think it is a fine thing. Hitherto you have been very good, and your own esteem of yourself is that as touching the commandments—"all these have I kept from my youth up." And what with a good deal of church-going, or attendance at the meeting house, and a few extra prayers on a Christmas-day and on Good Friday, and just a little dose of sacraments, you feel yourself in tolerably good case. Now, friend, that old moth-eaten righteousness of yours that you are so proud of you must sell off and get rid of it, for no man can be saved by the righteousness of Christ while he puts any trust in his own. Sell it all off, every rag of it.

Ay, and there are some men that will have to give up a good deal of what they call pleasure, sinful pleasure. Come, can you sell all that off? That mixing in loose company, anything approaching to lewdness, anything that has to do with the gratification of the vile passions of the flesh—come, for Christ's sake, can you give it up? These things must be sold if we are to have the pearl.

Popularity.

And, then, sometimes, in some cases, men have to give up a good deal of the honors and the satisfaction of life that arise from the esteem of their fellow-creatures. Has it come to this, "If I become a Christian they will ridicule me." Well now, can you not put up with a little obloquy for Christ? "But if I am an earnest Christian than I shall have to encounter all sorts of slander." Very well, can you put the whole lot of it into the scale and say, "I sell it all off; let it all go, that I may have the pearl."

"Well, you have taken enough surely." Yes, but this pearl hunter sold all that he had, and you have got a little left. You have got some prospects. If you become a Christian your old uncle will cut you out of his will. You know very well that if you shall go to hear the Gospel at such and such a place you are very likely to be turned out of your situation. "But we must live," says somebody. This is not at all clear to my mind. I do know that we must die, but as to "must living," I do not feel quite so certain about it. Infinitely better to die than ever to do a dishonorable thing. If Jesus Christ be our Master, we must be content to let the fairest prospect go, and all thing that seem to tell for our success in this life must be secondary in our account. The merchant sold all that he had.

I think I see you draw back. "This—this is too hard a line." Very well, if you do not want to buy the pearl, you see—that is to say, if you do not want to make your fortune—for that buying of the pearl was the making of the man's fortune—if you do not think the pearl is worth it, pray do not have it. God forbid you should refuse, but if you do not want him, then say so.

IV. Now, the last thing is

The Buying.

He had sold all that he had, and then he pays the shekels over—pays them over that he may have the pearl, and he gets the pearl. It was a considerable purchase—a deliberate bargain. He did not see the pearl and then in a hurry go and sell his goods and guess at the value of it. No, but he had looked at it, for he was a seeker of pearls. And so he thought it over. It did not want much thinking over. Oh, if a soul did but know Christ, he would not think twice before he would have him. If men were not such fools—if they had but light from heaven to see the value of my Lord and Master, instead of our standing here and having to beg and persuade and find out new words of commendation, methinks they would only say, "Tell us about him. We will have him. What does he ask of us? What can we do for him?"

And it was an immediate purchase. He did not go home and say, "I shall think about this." No, but he knew that pearl and he said,

"If I let that Slip through my fingers I shall never see the like of it again. If anybody else gets that bargain, then I shall have lost the one opportunity of my life." And so he does but take time enough to go and sell his farm off, and the little land he had, and the little property he had. He was back quickly with his money. So, dear friends, he that cometh to Christ aright may well deliberate about it, but the end of his deliberation ought to be speedy. "If he is to be had, let me have him."

And, oh, what an enriching purchase it was which the man had made. So, brothers and sisters, if you have ever given up anything for Christ I am sure that the Lord Jesus Christ has made you very ample amends. Some years ago a person rather eccentrically advertised for persons who had been losers by obedience to the divine command—that if any one who had lost anything through love to Christ would apply to him he would make it up. The odd advertisement appeared for some months in one of our religious periodicals. But the oddest thing is that nobody ever answered it. I should have thought that somebody would have tried and made out a case; but nobody did. They cannot make out such a case: they are

No Losers by Christ.

"But," say some, "the martyrs were, were they not?" Well, they are up there, ask them. Oh, there is no losing when you deal with him.

This was a purchase he never regretted. He never wished to have it undone. With his pearl of immense worth he was a rich man, worthy to be the rival of princes, and he felt that it was enough. Oh, blessed are they who can say "It is enough," and can rejoice and bless and magnify the Lord.

Let me, however, just put in one word of caveat. Take care, dear merchant brothers, that when you buy a pearl you buy a good one—that it is the pearl of great price, because I have known noble spirits whom I have admired and felt ready to weep over; men that have been heroic in the pursuit of that which seemed to them perfectly true, and have made a sacrifice of all that they have for it, and yet

They Have Been Deceived.

Mind that you get Christ and his truth as you find it revealed in Scripture, and revealed a second time in your own heart by the Holy Ghost, for whatever is short of Christ is a cheat and will deceive you.

"Hearken to me, ye that follow after righteousness, ye that seek the Lord." The voice of Jesus is heard in this parable of the kingdom describing and directing the seekers. Such persons comprise no small fraction of an assembly like the present one. I am sure some of you have seen the pearl you want sparkling before your eyes. I wonder how many of you have resolved to sell all you have to buy it. But who among you all have actually made the pearl your own, and rejoice in its possession? That such of you will go on your way rejoicing there is no doubt; but will you not return and give glory to God? Shall we not have the happiness of greeting you here in the fellowship of the kingdom of his grace? The Lord grant it may be so for Jesus' sake. Amen.

BEGIN THY DAY.

BEGIN thy day with God:
He is thy sun and day;
He is the radiance of thy dawn,
To him address thy lay.
Take thy first meal with God;
He is thy heavenly food;

Feed with and on him; he with thee
Will feast in brotherhood.

Thy first transaction be
With God himself above;
So shall thy business prosper well,
And all the day be love.

THE CUBAN PIONEER.

A Glorious Christian Work Being Done in Havana By Dr. A. J. Diaz.

WONDERFUL as a story of romance, is the history of the man whom God has blessed to the evangelization of a large district in the island of Cuba. His name is Alberto J. Diaz, and his portrait appears in this column. He is a native of Havana and was thoroughly educated in that city. Having passed a University course, he adopted the profession of medicine. Soon after he received his diploma, however, the revolution broke out, and Diaz took up arms with his countrymen for the liberation of his native land. The insurgents were hopelessly outnumbered by the Spanish forces and out of the whole regiment to which Diaz belonged, only he and three other soldiers escaped massacre. They threw themselves, under cover of the darkness into the sea and clinging to a huge piece of timber drifted far out from land. It was a desperate resort, but death at the hands of the Spaniards was certain, and they could but die if they trusted themselves to the waves. All night long they floated, and when morning broke they were gladdened by the sight of a small vessel near at hand. They were rescued and brought to New York.

It was in the depth of winter that they landed and these men, accustomed to a climate in which the thermometer rarely falls below seventy degrees, suffered terribly. They wandered about the city looking for some one who could speak Spanish. They at last found a Spaniard who kept a cigar-store and to him they told their story. He guided them to the hospitable home of a fellow-countryman, who welcomed and cared for them. But the cold and exposure had done their work. Diaz was taken ill with pneumonia. While he was ill, a lady in the house went to his sick chamber to see him. She could not speak Spanish, but she seemed very kind and she read out of a book and prayed with him. Diaz could not understand what she had read, but he appreciated her good-will and as a matter of courtesy he intimated to her that he would like to look at her little book. It proved to be a New Testament. Up to that time Diaz had never seen the Book. Though he was a student and a frequenter of the best public libraries in Havana, no copy of God's Word had ever fallen into his hands. He examined the Book and inferred from certain words of Latin derivation that it was a religious work. As he was puzzling over it a Spaniard, who called to see him, told him that there was a Spanish translation of it. Diaz procured one at once and began its perusal.

He was deeply impressed with the miracle of the cure of the blind man. To him, as a physician who had made a special study of diseases of the eye, the incident was extraordinary. He read it and re-read it and then he could not rest until he had learned all there was to be known about the Man who could work such a cure. He read on and at the end of his study he fell on his knees and prayed the prayer of the blind man: "Jesus of Nazareth have mercy on me." Much of his time after this was spent in prayer and study of the Word. He was eager to get back to Cuba that he might tell his countrymen what he had discovered. The proclamation of an amnesty soon gave him the opportunity. He went back to Havana, began practising as a physician, but devoting his time chiefly to telling all with whom he came in contact about Jesus. They were interested, as he had been, in the story and soon several hundred would come together to hear Diaz

Bible and talk of Jesus. This movement necessarily attracted public notice and provoked opposition. Diaz found it everywhere and most strongly in his own family. His mother denounced him as a heretic and vowed she would not speak to him again until he ceased holding meetings and declared himself a faithful Catholic. Nor would she listen to his protestations of affection and his appeals to her to read the Bible for herself. For several months, although her son was living in the same house with her, she did not speak a word to him. But Diaz waited patiently in faith and prayed daily that her eyes might be opened. One evening to his intense surprise Diaz saw his mother in the meeting. He thought she had come to disturb the meeting and denounce him and he was greatly embarrassed. But she had really come to profess her faith in Christ, whom she had found by reading her son's Bible, and to join herself to the company her son was forming into a church. Diaz welcomed her with great joy and he subsequently had the pleasure of receiving his father also into membership.

So far, God's Word had been the only instructor; and in these days of doubt and cavil it is worthy of notice that the Book should have had the power to do so much. What other book on earth could have done that? But now Diaz felt that some church organization was needed and also some further light on the Word. He returned to New York to consult some minister of the Gospel. Walking out on the evening of his arrival, he passed Dr. McArthur's Church, where service was being held. He entered and took a seat at the back of the Church. At that service he gained much light. Subsequently he made the acquaintance of other clergymen, was baptized and received spiritual counsel. Returning to Cuba he organized his church on the principles of the Baptist Denomination. Since that time he has received about twenty-two hundred persons into fellowship and has continued preaching and working for Christ.

It was not long before towns outside Havana began sending in requests that Diaz would visit them and tell the story which had so moved his fellow citizens. He gladly responded and has made several missionary journeys. He has suffered much at the hands of the priests. He was thrown into prison and might have remained there a long time had not Mr. J. S. Paine, of Boston, Mass., whose acquaintance he made when in America, laid his case before our State Department and secured its interposition in his behalf. Since then he has had the gratification of baptizing both his jailor and the Mayor who ordered his imprisonment. The work is still going on with tokens of the Divine blessing. Diaz has now seven stations and twenty missionary workers.

CHRIST'S HOME-COMING.

WHAT a grand day that must have been in heaven
When our dear Lord from his earthly life came home;
How clear the choral anthems must have risen
Surging from farthest gate to palace dome.

How the far hills that skirt the Crystal City
Would catch the echoes in their onward roll;
While the great clouds would spread their glowing banners
Wide, as they crowned them like an open scroll.

Would not the throng-like tidal wave pass forward,
Intent that wondrous form again to see
That shewed the unsealed mysteries of heaven
The centre of creation's tragedy?

Had they not watched him from the Bethlehem manger
Through his lone boyhood in the Nazareth lanes,
Up to the summit of the rugged Calvary—
Pouring out life-blood from exhausting veins?

The hearts of even angels must have saddened
While the world's heart was holding him afar,
From the wide wound inflicted by the sword-thrust
Of the dethroned and fallen "Morning Star."

A heart enfolded by earth's dark-winged anguish,
A soul embittered by life's mockery;
When pain sits crowned, and joy's dear heart doth languish,
Remember soul, what Christ hath borne for thee.

THE CHURCH AT PRAYER.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Jan. 3, 1892.
Isa. 11:9; John, 17:18-23.

WORTHY of special remembrance, at this time of united prayer, is the promise of our Lord, that, "If two of you shall agree on earth as touching anything that they shall ask, it shall be done for them of my Father who is in heaven." He who approaches God with this promise clearly before him, apprehending the person and character of him who made it, and the power and love of him of whom it was made, will offer no formal or perfunctory prayer. He will be one of those who believe "that he is and that he is the rewarder of them that diligently seek him." He will be one of those who expect an answer according to the promise. To every such man belongs our Lord's assurance, "According to your faith be it unto you."

From thousands of assemblies this week will ascend prayers for the same blessings. They are blessings which the whole Evangelical Church throughout Christendom desires, and which God has it in his power to grant. Can it be that the answer will be withheld? If so, it will be for the church to examine itself. Is she sincere and in earnest in her prayers? The ordinary tests will suffice to determine the answer. We know whether a man is in earnest in his worldly occupation. He devotes to it his thoughts, his labor, his capital; is watchful, vigorous, energetic, persistent, when he is in pursuit of wealth or power. No opportunity escapes him, he seeks openings for extending his operations, enlists all the help that he can obtain, exercises the utmost vigilance and spares neither time nor effort to achieve his purpose. That is earnestness. Is the church in earnest then? These objects for which she is praying this week—is she seeking them in this way? They who go to God must go in spirit and in truth. If the profession of a desire for these objects is, as Carlyle said, "from the lips outward," and not from the heart, they will not be granted in full measure. Whether they are from the heart, God will know by the manner in which they are being pursued. If the church is in earnest, she is striving after these things as men strive for wealth and power.

The individual Christian, however, should not lose his individuality in the Church. Every man must give an account of himself to God. If the Church is apathetic and lukewarm, the fault is with the units. The hope of the Church is in its individual members. They need a leader and they find him in their minister; but that were a lost cause in which the rank and file rested on their arms and expected the Captains to do the fighting. Therefore self-examination must be an individual not a collective task. The question should be asked in the recesses of every heart, Am I doing all that I can to bring about these blessings for which I pray? And that question answered let the prayer ascend in faith.

A FILIAL SERVICE.

THREE Circles of King's Daughters in Brooklyn, N. Y., submitted a petition to the Presbytery at its meeting on December 7. The petition ran as follows:

The circles of King's Daughters connected with your church do petition the presbytery of Brooklyn, through you, for advice and encouragement to inaugurate a movement having for its ultimate end the establishment of an institution for worthy aged people of our denomination, of both sexes, who are no longer able to support themselves, which shall be a Brooklyn Presbyterian home. It is unnecessary for us to state to you the need of such a home, as the problem of "where" and "how" has already more than once confronted the members of this body in such cases. We know that the expense of completing and sustaining such a work will be very great, but we also know that the wealth and influence of the Presbyterian churches of Brooklyn are such that an earnest co-operative effort will soon remove the reproach which now rests upon us as a denomination.

The three circles signing the petition are connected with the Greene Avenue Presbyterian Church, and the document was presented to the Presbytery by its pastor, Dr. H. C. Mendenhall. A committee of two ministers and one elder was appointed to confer with the King's Daughters. It may be hoped that the result will be a practical one. The idea is in line with the work of the Order and is one that cannot fail to commend itself to the members of the churches.

THE Y. M. C. A. IN HARLEM, N. Y.

VISITORS from other cities to New York, who may be concerned about the welfare of the young men and boys in their own neighborhoods, would do well to visit the Harlem

Y. M. C. A. BUILDING, HARLEM, NEW YORK.

Branch of the Young Men's Christian Association, at 5 West 125th Street, and have a talk with the indefatigable Secretary, Mr. F. G. Banister. The visit would open their eyes to what can be done to save young men from "going wrong" amid the temptations of a great city. Since the Elevated Railroads have been built, that northern section of Manhattan Island has become densely populated. A large number of the residents are families of moderate means. Included among the members are numbers of boys and young men who have their time between six or seven o'clock and bed-time at their own disposal. Where and how shall they spend those hours? The saloons, theatres and hundreds of vicious resorts beckon them. Perhaps the youth is not viciously inclined, but he has been all day in the office or store, is weary and wants recreation and society. The temptation is strong. He begins at the more reputable places, acquires evil habits and soon passes by easy steps to the most disreputable. Would it not be possible to catch such a youth at the start and provide him with the recreation and society he craves and lead him upward instead of downward? That would be a good work, having in it the promise of blessing for the individual and society. So Christian men have thought. They grappled with the problem and the practical result of their study is one of the best equipped and best managed Y. M. C. Associations in the country.

As will be seen by the accompanying picture, the Association building is a substantial and elegant edifice. It is designed for the cultivation and development of all the three parts of a young man's being. For the physical, there is a well-equipped gymnasium and a large plunge bath where professors of gymnastics and swimming are ready to give instruction to the members. For the mental, there are class-rooms where mechanical drawing, phonography, type-writing and book-keeping are taught. There is also a library of 2,800 volumes and a reading-room where choice periodicals are to be found. For the spiritual, there is a large hall where Bible-classes, devotional-meetings and religious services are held. Beside these there is a parlor for receptions and social gatherings and the Association maintains an employment bureau, a boarding-house register, and other accessories. All the arrangements are duplicated in the Boy's Department, the members of which are between the ages of twelve and sixteen years. There is also a Ladies' Auxiliary, the membership of which is about two hundred, who participate in the gymnasium and social meetings. That these advantages are appreciated is evident from the fact that there are now over eight hundred active members on the list and the numbers are growing.

AN APPEAL FOR FELLOWSHIP.

AN earnest appeal on behalf of united effort has been sent to us signed by a number of eminent clergymen. Among the signatures are those of Professor Harper, of Chicago University, President E. B. Andrews of Brown University, President Merrill E. Gates of Amherst College, President E. D. Eaton of Beloit College, Bishop Samuel Fallows, Dr. Charles F. Deems, Dr. Josiah Strong, Dr. Wayland Hoyt, Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman, Dr. Teunis Hamlin and thirty-five other pastors of churches of various denominations. It is a plea for undenominational Christian fellowship of young people's societies, and earnestly recommends the Christian Endeavor Society as the one in which members of all denominations may unite without losing their denominational connection. The address in part is as follows:

We address you in the interests of Christian and spiritual fellowship. We feel that this may be very largely promoted by the Young People's Societies of Christian Endeavor with their 1,050,000 members, and that the youthful adherents of the various evangelical bodies have never had such an opportunity of learning to know and love each other, without sacrificing one whit of the loyalty they owe to their own denominational polity and doctrine. We should esteem it a great disaster if different denominational young people's societies, intended practically to supplant Christian Endeavor Societies, are formed, and the young people are separated from the delightful interdenominational fellowship which they have enjoyed through Christian Endeavor. After a time, should a merely sectarian spirit be fostered, the great interdenominational gatherings which have marked the Christian Endeavor movement will become impossible, and all that has been done, and more that has been hoped for the future, in the way of spiritual fellowship, from the ten years' history of this society, will be sacrificed. It is well known to you that the United Society of Christian Endeavor exercises no control over and levies no taxes on local societies. It is simply a bureau of information. It does not even ask any contributions to carry on the work, nor is rigid uniformity demanded of societies. Each local society differs somewhat from every other, according to the needs of the local church to which every society is strenuously loyal, but all have some common principles and methods.

We are not urging any objections to unions of young people for the sake of denominational instruction and control. Such unions need not withdraw the young people from this interdenominational fellowship unless the local societies wholly discard the Christian Endeavor principles or name. This name, too, can, wherever it is allowed by denominational authorities, be linked with a purely denominational name. Thus "Epworth Leagues of Christian Endeavor" can enjoy the interdenominational fellowship of the Christian Endeavor movement, and be as fully under the control of the general Epworth League as if they had no such fellowship.

AN UPWARD LOOK.

EVERY day is a fresh beginning,
Every morn is a world made new;
You who are weary of sorrow and sinning,
Here is a beautiful hope for you,
A hope for me and a hope for you.

All the past things are past and over,
The tasks are done and the tears are shed,
Yesterday's error let yesterday cover;
Yesterday's wounds which smarted and bled,
Are healed with the healings which night has shed.

Every day is a fresh beginning!
Listen my soul to the glad refrain,
And spite of old sorrow and older sinning,
And puzzles forecasted and possible pain,
Take heart with the day and begin again.

UNCLE JOHN'S TALKS.

He Tells of Christmas Celebrations and Traditions in Many Lands.

RIGHT merrily did the younger members of the household greet the coming of Christmas, and the prospective visit of the patron saint of childhood—Santa Claus. For weeks this had been the evening topic, and what might be expected to happen on that momentous day now became a burning question.

"Patience!" counselled the good mother. And Uncle John, too, strove to divert them from inquiring too closely into certain little private preparations that were being made for their benefit, by telling them of Christmas in other lands.

Tom had brought in some branches of holly and mistletoe, and the children gazed upon them with unfeigned delight.

"The holly is venerated by the people of northern Europe," explained Uncle. "In some parts of Germany it is called the holly-tree or the Christmas-tree. The mistletoe comes to us from the Druids—a sect who worshiped in the forests in old pagan days, and who had a legend that it came from heaven, and every one who came under it received a kiss, as the branch with its bright berries was the emblem of love. They believed it would cure all diseases; but that was mere superstition, of course. In old English homes, when the great boar's-head was brought on the table to be eaten, it was decorated with rosemary, and had an apple or an orange stuck in its mouth and a spray of mistletoe on top of it all."

"Has there always been a Christmas Day?" asked Ted, innocently, whereupon the others laughed.

"No, not always," said Uncle. "You know it is the day on which the dear Saviour was born. For a long time after that event—just how long nobody knows—it was celebrated on the 6th of January, but the Roman Emperor, Julius I, (who lived three hundred years after Christ's birth), changed the date to the 25th of December. On Christmas Eve the early Christians used to sing carols, in memory of the sweet song the angels sang to the shepherds. Sometimes the bishops would sing, to set an example of joy to the rest. I don't know that any record exists to tell just how or under what circumstances the first celebrations was held, but it is certain that as long ago as the fifth century, it supplanted the heathen festivals—such as the Saturnalia, a wild, drunken orgie. St. Augustine mentions the date of the Christmas festival and Chrysostom speaks of its gradual growth during his own lifetime."

"Does every country have a Santa Claus, Uncle?" asked one of the group.

"Not as you know him, dear; but the good old gift-maker who, the legends tell us, delights the young hearts with his gifts, is merely a type, such as the childish mind can grasp, of the great gift that came to the whole world on that day—the gift of God's own Son—which should kindle gratitude in every heart.

"In France," continued Uncle John, "the Christmas festival is the Noel, in Germany the Weihnachtsfest, and in the Scandinavian countries, as well as England, it used to be called Yule. There were merry revels at many of the royal courts in olden times on Christmas Eve, and the festivities of to-day are much subdued compared with those of a few hundred years ago. In England, the revels at the court were under the direction of a leader chosen for the occasion and dubbed the Lord of Misrule. At the Scottish Court, the one who performed the same function was called The Abbot of Uurcaison. So wild and absurd were some of the pranks and capers the merry-makers indulged that the leadership was abolished by law, in obedience to the desire for a more orderly and becoming observance of the day. Then the peasantry had their own way of celebrating; they had home games, dipping for nuts and apples, eating hot cakes and other innocent pleasures. Our early Puritan fathers discountenanced such frivolous amusements, and Christmas in our own land has never been characterized by the same boisterous observance as among European nations."

"Do they observe it in Oriental countries, too?"

"In Christian communities, but not generally, of course. The Eastern churches adopted the Christmas festival from the Western churches about 380, A.D. Dioctletian is said to have ordered the burning of a whole church full of Christians who had met to celebrate the nativity of the Saviour. Among the Christians families of Syria the day is observed very generally; indeed, in Beyrout—which is the principal city of that country—the people and their surroundings have more of a European aspect than most other Eastern cities, and Western customs are fast taking hold. Beyrout has among its population, Mohammedans, Druses, Jews and Christians, and Gospel work has been going on there for over forty years by the American Presbyterian and other missions. Many of the young men and women are capital Bible scholars and sing our own Gospel hymns, and when Christmas comes around they observe it with a reverent joy that is peculiarly Oriental. Here is a photograph of one of the young Christian women of Beyrout," and he showed the group the portrait of a girl in a picturesque costume that had in its character something both of Europe and the East. She was decked as if for some festivity, and strings of coin ornamented the front of her dress.

"At the Missionary College in Beyrout," he added, "English is the language used, although Arabic is thoroughly taught. The wonderful mixture of races is shown in the fact that at an orphanage there, where 130 orphans are taught, having no servants and doing all the work themselves under the guidance of eight teachers, eighteen nations and seventeen different forms of religion are represented, although all receive Bible instructions together. In some of the mission schools in Beyrout, it is beautiful to hear the sweet voices singing hymns in Arabic to the tunes we know so well—sometimes Christmas hymns, too, telling how Jesus was born in Bethlehem. We should not forget that Syria is the cradle of our Christianity and that therefore we owe it a debt of gratitude we cannot repay."

Thoughtless Girls.

THOUGHTLESSNESS in the young, when it becomes a settled habit, amounts to a vice. On this point a writer in the St. Louis Observer remarks: "Probably there are few of us who have not, at times, felt a pang of mortification at the foolish conduct of young girls upon the street. You can see them sauntering to and fro on the principal thoroughfares, half a dozen times of an afternoon, with that peculiar, careless gait which indicates that they have no business in particular to attend to; and sometimes at their side, or behind them, or ogling them from a street-corner, you see the face of some flashily dressed man, who has, perhaps, a wife and family of his own at home—too far away to interfere. You recognize, perhaps, the daughters of hard-working men, who can ill afford the slightest luxury, dressed expensively, gaudily (hence in marvelously bad taste), and apparently having no other occupation in life than to exhibit their charms to men that have as little sense as themselves. Ask these girls anything of that knowledge which will be useful to them in life, matters either of housekeeping, literature, or general information, and you will find them sadly at fault; all their thoughts are on their beaux; their conversation is the petty local gossip of the town or of their particular set. The fault of the thing lies, not so much with the child herself, as with the indulgent parents, who look with helpless sorrow upon her unaccountable waywardness, and at the door of society, which has not yet fully learned to inspire women with some other great purpose in life than the mere procuring of a husband.

SELECTING GIFTS FOR THE CHILDREN

A VERY difficult and trying task, indeed, is the selecting of Christmas gifts. One must needs look well to several things before he or she venture out on such a mission. The state of one's purse, the tastes and disposition of the person to whom the gift is to go and the probability of duplicating another gift—an untoward happening that would rob both of their preciousness. Mere dainties, candies and the like are hardly to be regarded as vehicles for the expression of the Christmas feeling. Dangerous playthings, liable to inflict damage or do physical injury are to be avoided. Mechanical novelties, games, tools, anything that will amuse, instruct or develop taste as the proper direction are to be commended. Whatever leads the child, by entertaining paths to useful, manly, noble thoughts or generous deeds, combined with wholesome recreation, is the best to choose for a gift. Whatever tends to excite vanity, recklessness or temper is utterly unfit for the purpose. Nor is a costly gift necessarily the most desirable. We have seen toy animals, cut rudely, yet not without artistic design, out of substantial blocks of wood, outlasting other playthings that cost six times their price and being much more highly appreciated besides. And when a child has reached the appreciative stage, there is no better present than a book, which has a real value, even after the gift and covers are worn off.

It takes time and work and skill to make the most, for the children, of Christmas morning, writes H. C. Trumbull in Hints on Child-Training; but it pays to do this for the darlings, while they still are children. They will never forget it; and it will be a precious memory to them all their life through. It is one of the child-training agencies which a parent ought to be glad to use for good.

He who would make children happy must do for them and do with them, rather than merely give to them. He must give himself with his gifts, and thus imitate and illustrate, in a degree, the love of him who gave himself to us, who is touched with the sense of our enjoyments as well as our needs, and who, with all that he gives us, holds out an expectation of some better thing in store for us: something which shall fully satisfy our hopes and longings when at last we have it in possession.

The Baby.

He will not always be a baby, says a writer in The Religious Telescope. The years will come and the years will go, and with their coming and going baby will develop into a happy, romping, vigorous, daring boy; and from that he will go on, up, up to full-grown manhood; and with his physical development will come a wider range for him. Out into the world he will go; and with his going there will come to him the dangers and the temptations of the world. These he must necessarily encounter, living in a world like this. From their assaults mother's love and father's solicitude can not screen him. But while his child-heart is in mother's and father's hands, like wax in the hand of the molder, they can, to a very great extent, so mold his moral convictions and so fortify and arm him against the world's seducements as to render him comparatively safe amid life's dangers and snares. Eli failed to do this, and his sons went to destruction; Timothy's mother did not fail to do this, and from his childhood he grew into a noble servant of the living God.

Yes, father, mother, that baby is a great joy to you now. That he may be such to you when he is a man grown, see carefully to the forming of his character every day. Humor him, caress him, love him; but do not fail to discipline, control, and restrain him.

The Virtue of Cheerfulness.

CHEERFULNESS, writes Miss Muloch, can become a habit, and habits sometimes help us over bad places. A cheerful heart sees cheerful things.

A lady and gentleman were in a lumber yard situated by a dirty, foul-smelling river. The lady said:

"How good the pine boards smell!"

"Pine boards!" exclaimed the gentleman.

"Just smell this foul river!"

"No, thank you," the lady replied, "I prefer to smell the pine boards."

And she was right. If she, or we, can carry this principle thro' our entire living, we shall have the cheerful heart, voice, and face.

CHAPTER V. (Continued.)

ETI and Aleph returned to Rachotis together.

They had scarcely turned away from the house before Antis came out from a recess across the street and stole after them—at a distance, but so as to keep them in sight. And they were not without particular notice from others. Two such commanding figures as to stature and bearing were not a common sight in Alexandria; and so the men whom they met would sometimes turn and gaze after them. One of these did more than stop and gaze. He followed—followed on one side of the street as Antis was following on the other.

I wonder what he meant! Was he a friend or an enemy? Or was it merely idleness and curiosity that prompted the following?

These latter make a motor of considerable power; sometimes even of fully as much power as any of our celebrated modern motors, or those mysterious ones used in the construction of the pyramids. And it certainly was in daily use in Egypt among all classes at the time of our narrative, and long before. Before the Ptolemies, before the Pharaohs, before the Dispersion, before Tubal Cain—in fact there is some reason to think that this motor was invented by the first man (some say by the first woman; but this is a base slander), and was from him handed down to all ages and countries. How else can we account for its omnipresence!

So it is by no means incredible that the following of Aleph just spoken of, was not due to hostility. I hope it was not. I hope it did not mean mischief. Still I confess to some fears. Somehow I begin to feel an interest in that young man; and if any harm should come to him it would trouble me not a little.

VI.

THE CUSTOM HOUSE.

ALEPH found Cimon already at the khan; and, after giving an account of his own experiences, received the following from his friend.

Cimon went first to the khan they had just left for an article that had been forgotten, and to learn what he might of the ways of the neighboring custom house.

He found that he was yet considerably too early for the business hours of the chief official; and so lingered, making inquiries of the innkeeper about the chief traders of the city, especially in the line of the eastern goods. Who are they? Where are their places of business? How long have they been established? What reputations do they bear? These questions were freely answered—with some vagueness and reserve, however, as to the last of them; as was to be expected from a man who speaks about his neighbors to a stranger. Cimon found that Malus was by far the largest and most successful dealer in the city.

"How did that happen?"

"Well, you see, he has the most capital: so he has the best goods, the cheapest, and the greatest variety; and then his positions as harbor-master and farmer-general of all imports from the south give him special advantages for turning trade in his own direction. As harbor-master he is the first one to meet the owners of goods on their arrival, and can hasten or delay the passing through the custom house: as farmer of the duties he has less duty to pay than his rivals, even if he makes none of the illegal exactions with which some charge him. However this may be, it is certain that he has very great opportunities of befriending those who deal with him, and can make it for their interest to patronize him rather than others. People lay much stress on this. So he has crushed out many small dealers. Still, not a few manage to maintain themselves against him, though they make small profits where he makes large ones. There are yet many people who for various reasons prefer to go elsewhere than to Nos. 110, 111, 112 Emporium Street. We are among them"—and the man shrugged his shoulders.

Cimon took out his tablets and made some entries.

While he was doing this, who should come in but the Jew who had so curiously followed him from the synagogue! The man was surprised, and apparently delighted, to see Cimon. It appeared that he was a brother of the absent landlord, and had come to bring news of him to his family. He had left him in Judea a few days before, and expected that he would soon be able to return. He then turned to Cimon and inquired about his young companion of yesterday.

"That young man haunts me," he said. "His face meets me everywhere; if I read, his features comes between me and the papyrus; if some one enters my house I look up to see if it is not he; if I am walking in the street I forget my errand and look for him instead. For example, while on my way here I forgot what I was coming for, and found myself opposite the Diapleuston waiting for him to appear, and, had he appeared, no doubt I should have acted as ridiculously as I did yesterday."

Cimon explained that they had seen occasion to remove to another part of the city; but were still proposing to seek him out and hear about the eastern pilgrims of whom he had spoken. Perhaps he would not object to give some particulars now—reserving to some future time, when his young friend could be with him, a fuller account. Could they not pass into the court and seat themselves where they would not be exposed to interruption?

The Jew readily consented; and this was the substance of his narrative.

When he was scarcely more than a boy there came to the khan on the east of the city, then kept by his father, a large caravan of eastern people, on their way home from Judea. It was led by three men—all remarkable for dignity of manner, richness of apparel, and other signs of great distinction, if not of princely rank. Two of them were old men; but old after the manner of Moses. Their eyes were as bright, their forms as erect, their steps as firm and elastic as one ever sees in the young. But the third was comparatively young; and a finer specimen of humanity in all respects the khan had never seen, though it had seen, first and last, a wide variety of people from all nations.

Ah, that young man knew how to walk—how to ride, too! When he came and went, whether on foot or on his Arabian, the servants would run to every convenient outlook to wonder at the easy grace and majesty of his movements.

On the arrival of the caravan the khan happened to be quite without guests. The pilgrims at once took all the vacant rooms, and remained several days in the city—examining it fully in every direction; its temples, palaces, harbors, markets, warehouses, manufactures, libraries, schools. They evidently were very devout persons; not as the idolaters are, but after the Hebrew manner. Every morning and evening they gathered all their servants, and read from copies of the Law and Prophets, and prayed most reverently to the Invisible; and on the Sabbath they went separately to the synagogues; and when they left the city they carried away with them many copies of the Greek Scriptures—also, it was said, a Greek young man, well taught in all the western learning and accomplishments, but who had lost his parents and other near relatives, and so had few ties to detain him here. This was what was said: the Jew could not vouch for it, as he had never seen the young Greek.

But these were not the most important facts about the pilgrims. Some in the caravan spoke the Greek language and the people of the inn used to listen with wonder to the story that gradually came to them.

For generations it had been widely understood in parts of the East that a great king would some day appear in Judea in whom all the families of the earth would be blessed. But lately it was revealed to each of the three chiefs that the birth of this king was about to take place, and that when it had taken place the fact would be signified to them by the appearance of a new star-like body in the western sky, and that on seeing it they should journey westward to carry the homage and presents of the East to the new-born monarch. So they conferred together, made ready their caravans, and watched the heavens nightly for the promised sign.

At last it came. The day had faded away into the night, when lo, a glorious beam shot to the watchers, and they saw a great star hanging low in the west—a star wholly unlike the evening star, or any other star ever seen in that quarter of the sky. The signal was promptly and joyfully obeyed. Meeting at a place before agreed upon, the chiefs joined caravans and proceeded toward Judæa—the star appearing and going before them whenever their journey needed special guidance. So at last they came to Bethlehem, where the meteor sank low and blazed over the house where a young child was. Then they knew that they had found the King; though it was in no palace, but in a very humble home bare of all but the barest necessities.

Was it a beautiful child? Even as Moses, exceeding fair. Was he afraid of the bearded men as they knelt before him and presented their gold and frankincense and myrrh? Not at all. There were the dawns of a kindly repose and welcome in his eyes as he fearlessly stretched out his little hand and laid it on the thin white hairs and on the dense brown locks that were successively bowed low before him.

And then they heard of things even stranger than those they had themselves experienced. For the mother told them of angels who came to predict the Messiah and his forerunner; and many people of Bethlehem, attracted by the star and the stately caravan, came hastening up and told how their shepherds had seen and heard on the night of the Birth a glory of angels that shone and sang above them like a descending heaven, and sent them to a manger to find their long-expected King.

The youngest of the three chiefs was so much impressed by the story of the shepherds that he put it into a song which some in the caravan learned and often chanted.

"Did you hear it?" interrupted Cimon.

"Yes: and our father would have us commit it to memory. I think that even now I can recite it word for word."

"Please do so."

The Jew, after a few moments of recollection, proceeded to recite as follows:

"No tongue can tell the sacred pomp,
That swept from heaven one day,
And trailed its glory past the spheres
To where the Infant lay—
Lift up your eyes in vast surprise,
Ye shepherds, on the scene,
And see the flaming forms that hang,
The heavens and earth between!

Upon their heads are golden crowns,
Their robes are white as snow,
Soft lightnings from their faces flash
Upon the vale below;
Before the glory of the Lord
The stars turn pale and flee—
Oh, what a sight that gracious night
For shepherd swains to see!

Through all the still and scented air
There comes a deeper calm,
As if from fear lest it should hear
Naught of the coming psalm:
And now the air grows sweeter still;
Slow beat the balmy wings:
Clear o'er the mute and raptured earth
The choir of angels sings.

Sings praises in the highest song
That highest Heaven can raise;
Sings praises to the highest King
That hears the voice of praise;
To Him who to the earth descends
In pity and in love,
And o'er its warring tribes extends
The white wings of the dove.

And far across Judean hills,
Swell out the storms of praise—
I would that tempests such as this Might gladden all my days!
For lo, 'tis Paradise to hear
The glory of that sound,
That swells so grandly to the skies,
So humbly seeks the ground.

Full many an age will vanish,
Full many songs be given
But ne'er again such wondrous strain
Will shake the arch of Heaven;
And yet each year our hearts will see
A glory on the wing,
And still each year our hearts will hear
That winged glory sing.

And ever as we give our gifts,
And deck our homes with green,
Our souls will kindle in the blaze
Of that strange midnight scene,
And sing His praise in joyful lays,
By whom the Child was given,
Whose advent here sent mighty cheer
Through all the choirs of Heaven."

There were tremblings on the tongue of the Jew as he closed his low chant, and tears in the eyes of the Greek; but the latter said nothing for a few moments, and then merely asked that the narrative might proceed. So the Jew resumed.

The chiefs would willingly have lingered long in Bethlehem; but the same Divine Word that had brought them almost immediately sent them away. The next night the message came, "Let them return—and return by another way." So they returned by way of Egypt and the Red Sea.

Shortly after the pilgrims had left Alexandria, news came that Herod, in a fit of jealousy had massacred all the male children in Bethlehem under two years of age. It was like him. Everybody believed the story. But could it be that the Messiah of whose triumphs and reign so many prophets, in so many ways, had spoken, had perished in his infancy? Could the promises of God be broken by the cruelty of man? Was Herod strong enough to defeat the Almighty?

The khan had hardly begun to ask these questions before there appeared at its gate a man leading an ass, on which was seated a young woman who carried in her arms a little boy. The mother was interesting—the boy was wonderful. Never had the landlord seen such a child. It was not merely that he was comely in the highest degree—it was the mystery of expression in his face. As one looked on it nothing seemed too good or great to be believed of him. His body seemed a thin veil through which flashes of inexhaustible treasures of wisdom and goodness and power were continually struggling. You who have seen a light shining through thin alabaster—you who have seen a gem in whose heart rainbows seemed imprisoned—you who have seen a soft, white cloud around whose edges have crept suggestions of an intolerable glory within and behind, can have some idea of how that wonderful Child impressed the people of the khan. By degrees they learned that the family had come from Bethlehem, that fear of Herod was the cause of their leaving, that the eastern princes had been under their roof—at last, when confidence was full-grown and all reserve thrown away, that they had among them the very Star-Child to which the journeying East had brought its loyal homage and tribute.

It was strange to see the mixture of tenderness and awe with which the mother dealt with her son—strange to see the mixture of weakness and power, of humbleness and superiority, of dependence and independence with which the son dealt with his mother. At one moment it seemed as if she was acting the part of a Providence to him; at another as if he was acting the part of a Providence to her.

The house was a different house from the time that Jesus (for such was his name) entered it. A new element had come into its air; a new light seemed to rest on every object; never had its inmates found it so easy to pray and lead a good life. It was as if a new life had silently come under their own; and, like a broad wave, was lifting it heavenward. The eyes of Jesus, from their fathomless depths, seemed to invite to all that was holy and to forbid all that was sinful.

But even Alexandria was too near Herod. So, after the sacred family had well rested from their journey, they went still further south. It was a sad day for the khan when they went away. The host would take nothing in the way of compensation—save a smile from the young mother and a touch from the child for each child of his. How that touch thrilled them through and through as with some mysterious healing!

The khan kept his secret. After a while news came that the Holy Family went as far as Mantareeh, and remained there till the death of Herod, when they returned to their own country. After that, ears were kept wide-open toward Judæa; for it could not be thought that such a beginning would end in nothing—that man and circumstance would be allowed to defeat God.

But the waiting was long. At last the khan heard vaguely of strange excitements and movements in Judæa. Soon they learned that a great reformer had burst suddenly on the people from the wilderness—austere, fearless, mighty of speech, smiting the sins of high and low with the sword of his mouth, baptizing, followed by immense crowds, who inquired, is not this the Christ?

QUESTIONS & ANSWERS

OUR MAIL-BAG.

A. L., Crescent City, Fla. Did Christ know of the time and manner of his death during all his ministry, or was it only revealed to him at the Last Supper, as some suppose, from John 13: 21?

Christ's reference to the serpent when talking with Nicodemus (John 3: 14) would appear to indicate that he had a prevision of his death at the beginning of his ministry. His remark was of the same tenor as that he made later on (John 12: 32) of which the Evangelist observed: "This he said signifying what death he should die."

John S. Brammer, Alexander, Wayne Co., Ky. Did Dr. Talmage in his sermon on April 26, 1891, advocate baptism by immersion? Did he in the same sermon advocate close communion?

No, to both questions. The sermon does not in any part express a preference for sprinkling or immersion. So far from advocating close communion it is a plea for "close communication" between churches, and Dr. Talmage spoke with evident gratification of the fact that in his church "there is a mingling of all denominations."

J. H. Baxtressee, Middletown, Pa. Has a Christian a right under any circumstances to sin wilfully? Or please explain Heb. 10: 26.

No, and the text you mention emphasizes the fact with a warning. Under the Jewish dispensation, with which the writer of the epistle to the Hebrews is comparing the Christian dispensation, the sinner might bring an offering, but the writer here reminds Christians that sin can no longer be atoned for in that way. Being cleansed through the blood of Christ he must live a holy life.

Inquirer, Dunnysville, N. C. We read (Gen. 4: 16, 17) that Cain went to the Land of Nod and knew his wife. What kind of beings dwelt in the Land of Nod and what was their origin?

Various attempts have been made to identify the Land of Nod, but they are all unsatisfactory. The only clue we have is that it was to the east of Eden, and as we have no idea where Eden was that clue is of no value. The meaning of the word Nod is "exile" so that the Land of Nod may simply mean the land of Cain's exile. The only explanation of the inhabitants of the land, consistent with the verbal accuracy of the Bible is that they were descendants of Adam and Eve. Adam according to the Biblical account lived nine hundred and thirty years and "begat sons and daughters." (Gen. 5: 4.)

Peter Gabel, Sycamore, Ill. Do the promises in Mark 16: 17, 18 belong to all believers now as in Christ's time?

The facts prove that they do not. A Christian taking up a venomous serpent or drinking poison would undoubtedly suffer as a man would who is not a Christian. In the days when the promise was given, a handful of unlettered men were going out to preach to an unbelieving world and needed special miraculous power to help them in their testimony. These powers were granted for that special purpose. If you are thinking of making a personal test we would strongly urge you to consider before doing so whether Christ's words (Matt. 4: 8), do not apply in the case.

George W. Geyer, Middletown, N. Y. 1. What was the size of the baskets the disciples used when they gathered up the fragments? 2. What were the husks that the "swine did eat," in the Parable of the Prodigal Son?

1. The baskets, we are assured by an Orientalist, were in all probability about one foot in diameter and square—somewhat like our own lunch baskets. 2. The husks (see Luke 15: 16), were the fruit of the carob tree, which is common in Palestine and is used by the poor as food and for the fattening of swine or cattle. When ripe, it is like a cooked bean-pod, brown, glossy, and filled with seeds. Children eat it readily and seem to thrive on it. The carob is of the same family as the American locust tree. Its fruit is sometimes called "St. John's bread," as John the Baptist is thought to have lived upon it in the wilderness.

Adah J. Prudden, Ypsilanti, Mich. 1. Was the Holy Ghost before Christ's ascension identical with the Holy Spirit that he gave? 2. What did conversion mean to the Israelites before Christ? Did they have a different standard from ours? 3. Were the disciples converted while Christ was with them?

1. Yes. The operations of the Spirit before Christ, as referred to by the prophets show that he was the same. He enabled the prophets to predict the coming of Christ and to describe him; and after Christ's ascension he testified of him and brought all things to the remembrance of the disciples. The expression in John 7: 39 evidently refers to the special gifts which the Holy Spirit would have it in his power to impart when Jesus was glorified. 2. Conversion meant then as it does now a turning from sin to God (see Psalm 51: 13.) They had not the light we have, but in the eleventh chapter of Hebrews stress is laid on the fact of the Old Testament saints possessing and exercising faith much in the same way as we regard it as a test. 3. We cannot imagine Christ sending unconverted men out to preach. In leaving all they possessed to follow Christ, they gave better evidence of conversion than many Christians give in our day.

John Painter, Lattasbury, Ohio. Does my regeneration depend on man. Is not Christ the physician for me as he was to the thief on the cross, if I go to him in faith, or is it necessary that some one baptize me?

It is not necessary. If you exercise faith in Christ according to his word, he will accept you and you will be born again. Then he expects you to make public profession of him which you may do by baptism.

S. C. O., Apex, N. C. Please give me your idea of the meaning of John 20: 23. "Whosoever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them; and whosoever sins ye retain, they are retained." Do the Catholics get any of their doctrine from this verse of Scripture?

The minister must act as God's interpreter to the ignorant and humble; but the Almighty does not delegate his divine power of forgiveness to any man. Any Christian minister or layman can give the assurance to an inquirer that his sins are forgiven, if he believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and enlighten him as to his true position, just as a lawyer, on consulting the statutes, can assure a client that he has certain rights which he may claim if he complies with the conditions of the law. The Catholic assumption of the power of pardon and condemnation is totally unwarranted by Scripture.

A MISSIONARY IN A SCUFFLE.

MISSIONARIES in China have frequent need of all the coolness and discretion at their command to avoid personal injury and loss of property. The following instance is related by Rev. John Miles who is laboring at Chang-lo-Koi: "I was standing one market-day in a shop-door surrounded by a large number of country-people, when a few fellows of the baser sort forced their way to the front. One of them, evidently a fighting man, deliberately divested himself of his outer garment, rolled up his sleeves, and prepared for war. He demanded that we should hand over our books to him. I answered calmly: 'If you are thieves who rob people in the public streets in the day-time, please take them. Here is four hundred cash worth. Do not trouble about the money; we shall get it from the district magistrate—he is responsible.' This idea rather took them back, and the townspeople, in particular, cried out, 'Don't touch them.' Some one in the rear, however, shouted to take one only, so I held out a handful, from which our fighting friend stole just one of the smallest. This was handed back to the rear for inspection, and immediately there was a shout of 'Jesus doctrine!' 'Foreign doctrine!' 'Beat him, beat him!' 'Don't beat, don't beat!' I cried: 'that will cost the district magistrate many thousand taels!' My hat, however, was knocked off—this is always the first preliminary. It was clearly time for me to be off, so I got hold of my hat, charged a side of the circle of on-lookers, which at once gave way, and in a moment was hastening up the street with the crowd after me."

A LEPER MISSIONARY.

In the obituary column of a Calcutta journal appears the announcement of the death of a remarkable man. Nearly fifty years ago a young leper named Musuwa then about sixteen years old was befriended by a missionary. He was converted from Hinduism to Christianity. When the leper-asylum at Almora was founded he was one of the first patients admitted. He was then the only Christian leper in India. In 1864 he was baptized and from then until the day of his death he devoted himself to the service of Christ among the afflicted inmates of the asylum. Nearly every inmate who has applied for baptism has ascribed his conversion to the blessing of God on Musuwa's efforts. He was particularly successful in subduing and taming insubordinate patients. After Musuwa had talked with them they became gentle and amenable to religious influences. Several times the disease from which he suffered was arrested by some new remedy but eventually it reasserted its powers and finally rendered him quite blind. He still continued his talks with the others lepers and redoubled his efforts to win their souls to Christ, as he felt that his time was growing short. To one who saw him shortly before his death and sympathized with him, he talked joyously, rejecting all sympathy. He was going, he said to Jesus, the friend of lepers who would make him clean and whole.

THE DISTURBANCES IN CHINA.

CABLE reports from China for some time past have been of a character to cause serious apprehensions to the relatives and friends of missionaries in China. Somewhat reassuring, however, is the view of the situation which is published by the American Board in its Missionary Herald. As its facilities for obtaining accurate information are superior to those of the secular press there is all the more reason for thankfulness in the news given, which is as follows:

While other disturbances have taken place, notably in Ichang, the Chinese authorities seem to be acting with more vigor. It is singular in how many cases the apparent cause of the riots has been the charge of stealing or maltreating children. This was the case at Ichang. We have seen a copy of a placard issued in Wuhu during the riot there, in which it is specially charged that "women are procured from other places who are paid to abduct children," whom they shockingly mutilate [details given]. The proclamation then narrated several instances of such abduction, including the following statement which it speaks of as "more marvelous." "A one-year-old child, belonging to a woman by the surname of Shen, was lying in a cradle in the room, and disappeared in the twinkling of an eye, cradle and all, without leaving behind the slightest trace. The devilish tricks are so numerous that people are in despair of protecting their lives." The proclamation closes with a violent appeal to "chase out all the barbarian thieves. Only the Roman Catholic churches are to be disturbed." While these absurd charges are credited by multitudes and lead to riots, it must not be understood that they represent the opinion of all, or even a larger part of the people. A missionary in Hankow, who has resided there for over twenty years, says that they have unmistakable evidence of the goodwill of the people toward the missionaries, and he adds that in "case of a riot I would rather be in a missionary's house than in any other foreigner's house, not excepting the British consul's." There are numbers of Christians in Hankow, not Christians, who would step forward and say, 'Don't touch these missionaries.'

Beauty often depends on plumpness; so does comfort; so does health. If you get thin, there is something wrong, though you may feel no sign of it.

Thinness itself is a sign; sometimes the first sign; sometimes not.

The way to get back plumpness is by CAREFUL LIVING, which sometimes includes the use of Scott's Emulsion of cod-liver oil.

Let us send you—free—a little book which throws much light on all these subjects.

THE MASTER-PASSION.*

THE highest friendship never pivots on its reciprocal return, nor yet on its recognition and acceptance by the one loved. This is characteristically illustrated by the Oriental Soofee poet, Jamee, who has sometimes been called the "Persian Petrarch." Here is Alger's rendering of Jamee's teaching.

"Scheik Schubli, taken sick, was borne one day Unto the hospital. A host the way Behind him thronged. 'Who are you?' Schubli cried.

'We are your friends,' the multitude replied. Scheik Schubli threw a stone at them: they fled. 'Come back, ye false pretenders!' then he said; 'A friend is one who, ranked among his foes By him he loved and stoned and beat with blows, Will still remain as friendly as before, And to his friendship only add the more.'"

Napoleon's Friend.

While yet but a boy in the military school at Brienne, Napoleon won the friendship of a school-fellow named Demasis, who loved him for his own sake and was glad afterward to be his comrade in their earliest artillery service. There came a time, after his first military exploits at Paris and Toulon, when Napoleon was deprived of his command, and seemed destined to a life of hopeless inaction. Without money and without position, knowing that his mother was in want and that he could not help her, he gave way to temporary despair and was actually on his way to the riverbank to commit suicide by drowning, when he came face to face with a man dressed as a mechanic, whom he did not recognize but who embraced him warmly, crying out: "Is it you, Napoleon? How glad I am to see you again." It was his friend Demasis, who had recently come back to France in disguise, in order to visit his aged mother. Seeing the evident depression of Napoleon, he pressed him to disclose its cause and when he had learned the whole story, he said cheerily, "Is that all?" and unclasping a belt from underneath his coarse waistcoat, he thrust it into Napoleon's hands, with the words: "Here are six hundred dollars in gold, which I can spare without any inconvenience. Take them and relieve your mother." Long years after, Napoleon related this incident in his St. Helena prison-house, adding: "I cannot to this day explain to myself how I could have been willing to receive the money; but I seized the gold as by a convulsive movement and, almost frantic with excitement, ran to send it to my distressed mother." For fifteen years after that meeting with Demasis, he hunted in vain for his friend and when, at last, he found him, he learned that he had purposely kept out of sight, lest Napoleon should endeavor to reward him for his affectionate service.

Christian Warrior-Friends.

Never man fought as these men (Roland and Oliver on the battlefield of Roncesvalles) are said to have fought, when betrayed by a false comrade and outnumbered by a countless host of unbelieving Spanish foes. Hundreds fell by the hands of the Christian friends; and still they battled on until Oliver fell by the side of Roland and, as his eyes grew dim with death, he reached out lovingly toward his friend and said: "It is so dark, I cannot see thy face; give me thy hand. God bless thee, Roland! God bless Charles and France!" So saying he fell on his face and died. "Dear comrade,"

* From Friendship, the Master-Passion, a work on the nature and history of Friendship and its place in the World's Forces; by H. Clay Trumbull. 413 pp., price, $3; John D. Wattles, Philadelphia, Publisher.

Do not neglect disorders of the kidneys and liver. Hood's Sarsaparilla is just the remedy to rouse the important organs to healthy and regular action. Give it a trial now.

VAN HOUTEN'S COCOA—"Once tried, used always."

said brave Roland, as he lifted up his dead friend tenderly in his arms, "Thou wast ever a good and gentle friend to me; better warrior never brake a spear or wielded sword. . . . God rest thy soul! A sweeter friend and truer comrade no man ever had than thou." And only when Roland was the last of his host—"a lonesome man in the Valley of Death"—did he also fall down to die. No wonder that the great Charles should, according to the story, embalm the bodies of the hero-friends and carry them about with him in marble coffins wherever he went, as a memorial of their friendship.

How Modern Missions Began.

Great religious movements, with their limitless results of influence on successive generations, have again and again pivoted on, or been mainly impelled by, the personal friendship of their pre-eminent leaders. . . . When God would begin a new religious movement in the race, in the days of greatest degeneracy after the Flood, he chose one man to be his "friend" and he declared that in that friend, and because of that friendship, all the nations of the earth should find a blessing. It was because of the special friendship between Paul and Timothy that the letters from the one to the other have in them so much of tender sympathy and affectionate counsel as a means of good to appreciative readers to the end of time. . . . Mohammedanism owes a large share of its success to the sympathy, the companionship, the unswerving fidelity and the never-failing aid of Abou Bekr, the earliest, the latest, and the ever-dearest friend of its founder. . . . Modern missions had their most notable beginning in the sending out of Moravian missionaries from Herrnhut to the West Indies in 1732 and to Greenland in 1733. And this movement had its primary origin in the school-boy friendship at Halle, of Count Zinzendorf and the Baron von Wattenille, which led them to covenant together for evangelistic effort in behalf of the heathen and to form a Christian brotherhood, with a view to such effort, under the name of the Senfkorn-Orden—"The Order of the Grain of Mustard Seed." It was thirteen years after the first forming of this order that the attention of one of its leaders was called to the needs of the West India slaves in one direction and of the Greenlanders in another. Within a year or two more, two friends under the influence of this leader, were led to declare that they would if necessary be sold into slavery in order to preach Christ to the slaves in the West Indies; and soon, with three dollars apiece in their pockets and a bundle on the back of each as their only outfit, they were on their way afoot. . . . It was but six months later that another party of Moravian missionary friends was on its way to Greenland. And from that beginning of friendship's missionary work to the present day, the Moravians have transcended all other bodies of Christian believers in the missionary spirit and work.

A BANKER'S ADVENTURE.

A YOUNG man of fine talent, named W—, was some years ago chief clerk in a bank in Virginia. He was a good scholar and a courageous and honest young man, but was the leader of an infidel club, and had nearly succeeded in throwing from his mind the last shackles of what he used to call the "nursery superstition," which was the religion his pious mother had taught him.

On one occasion, upwards of one hundred thousand dollars in bank bills had to be carried to Kentucky, and he was selected to carry them. He was obliged to pass through a part of the country where highway robberies, and even murders were said to be frequent, and he arranged to pass it in the daytime. But he took the wrong road, and having lost himself, was glad to find a shelter anywhere.

He rode about a long time in the forest, amid the darkness and chilliness of a starless October night. At length he saw a dim light, and pushed his horse forward until he came to a poor wretched-looking cabin. It was now near ten o'clock. He knocked, and was admitted by a woman, who told him she and her children were all alone—her husband had gone out a-hunting; but she was certain he would return, as he always came home according to promise. The young man's feelings may well be imagined. Here he was with a large sum of money, alone, and perhaps in the house of one of those robbers whose name was the terror of the country. He could go no further—what was to be done? The woman gave him supper, and proposed his retiring. But no, he could not think of permitting himself thus easily to fall into the hands of robbers. He took out his pistols, examined the priming, and determined to sell his life as dearly as he could.

In the meantime the man of the house returned; he was rather a fierce, uncouth-looking hunter: he had on a deerskin hunting shirt, and bearskin cap, and seemed to be much fatigued, and in no talkative mood, all of which boded our young infidel no good. He asked the stranger if he did not wish to retire; he told him no; he would sit by the fire all night. The man of the house urged him. But no, he should not think of such a thing. He was terribly alarmed, and expected this would be his last night on earth. His infidel principles gave him little comfort. His fears grew into a perfect agony. What was to be done?

At length the backwoodsman rose up, and reaching over the stranger's head to a little shelf, took down an old book, and said,

"Well, stranger, if you won't go to bed, I will; but it is my custom always to read a chapter of Holy Scripture before I go to bed."

Alarm was at once removed from him. Though avowing himself an infidel, he had now full confidence in the Bible; he was at once safe; he felt that the man who kept an old Bible in the house, and read it, and bent his knees before his Maker, would do him no harm. He listened to the prayers of the good man, at once dismissed his fears, and lay down in that rude cabin and slept as calmly as he did under his father's roof.

From that day he ceased to revile the Bible. He became a Christian, and often related these facts to show that no man can be an infidel from principle.

BROTHERS OF THE COMMON LIFE.

AMONG the illustrative incidents quoted by Dr. Trumbull in his excellent work entitled Friendship the Master Passion, just published by John D. Wattles of Philadelphia, is the following story of a group of friendships which have been potent for good in the world:

Among the agencies which quickened the spiritual life of the Christian Church in the fifteenth century and prepared the way for the great Protestant Reformation of the sixteenth century, was the association known as "Brothers of the Common Life," the best-known representative or product of which is Thomas-a-Kempis, author of the "Imitation of Christ." This association was founded by Gerhard Groot, at Deventer. . . . Groot's conversion to the truth was distinctly a result of "a close and intimate friendship" formed by him at the University of Paris, with Henry Aeger. To this friendship is due, under God, all the mighty results of Groot's devotion to the cause of truth. "The chief companion of Thomas-a-Kempis at Deventer was Arnold of Schoonhaven, a youth of fervent piety, who from childhood was singularly devoted to God." The two friends occupied as schoolmates together "one little chamber and one bed." The example of his young friend Arnold's glowing piety made a deep impression upon a-Kempis, and the ideal thus presented to him of a lovingly consecrated life seems to have been the germ, as it were, of his out-reaching desire for a closer likeness to his Saviour that found expression in his pages. These were the friendships which aided in the shaping and impelling of the religious movements begun or prepared for by the association. . . . A young lad under the care of the Brothers of the Common Life in Deventer, in the last quarter of the fifteenth century, was afterwards known to the world as Desiderius Erasmus of Rotterdam. From his humble beginnings of learning in that school of friendship, Erasmus grew to be unmistakably "the greatest teacher of his age," and "one of the most gifted men that Europe has ever seen."

At Oxford Erasmus formed a friendship with John Colet, a young Englishman, son of a lord mayor of London, and that friendship proved a shaping force in the life and life work of Erasmus. Colet's name is less known to the world than Erasmus's, but Erasmus owes no small measure of his best fame to the inspiration and influence of his friend, Colet. John Richard Green, the historian of the English people, says concerning the power of Colet: "The awakening of a rational Christianity, whether in England or in the Teutonic world at large, begins with the Italian studies of John Colet. . . . His faith stood simply on the person of Christ." Speaking of Erasmus, Green adds that "his theology he derived almost without change from Colet." "When I listen to my friend Colet," wrote Erasmus, from Oxford, "I can fancy I am listening to Plato himself."

THE CHRISTIAN HOME.

A CHRISTIAN home is not austere, more like a prison than anything else, writes Rev. Samuel Pearson. Christ did not tell Martha to clear away her dishes, nor the rich man to give no feasts, nor the bride and bridegroom to cease the merry reception of their friends. No! not this. Yet there would be something different in the tone, because he was there. That shoving and pushing for the best chair, that eating and drinking for their own sakes, that pride and ostentation which so often spread the table, that supersensitive criticism of manners, because some had not obeyed a ceremonial law—these things would hide their diminished heads in the presence of Christ. What we need is the presence and spirit of the Master to guide, to temper, to control, and to sanctify our home joys. The simplest pleasures are the most satisfying. We cannot afford enjoyment on a large scale. But we may and should have them on the small. The merry laugh at table, the simple ditty, the old song, the indoor games, the outdoor pastimes, the face dimpled with smiles the children's hour, the frolic, the fun—these do much to keep the wheels going smoothly, and amid the severe struggle of life they are needed as much by the old as by the young. He who has been kept all day at prices, stocks, goods, could do no better than listen to a few foolish nursery rhymes. The wise man knows how to be foolish within limitations. And it is an entire misconception of Christianity to suppose that our Lord frowns at fun, or pours contempt on wholesome play. No! He who made the sea to smile, and the valleys to laugh and sing when the corn is ripe, means our households to be full of music.

To the Cook.

LET US SUGGEST HOW IT SHOULD BE HANDLED.

WITH A VERY SHARP KNIFE SHAVE OFF CLEANLY THE HARDENED SURFACE FROM THE FACE AND BUTT OF THE HAM. PUT IT OVER THE FIRE IN COLD WATER AND LET IT COME TO A MODERATE BOIL AND KEEP IT STEADILY AT THIS POINT. A HAM WEIGHING 13 POUNDS WILL NEED TO BOIL 5 HOURS. MANY COOKS SERVE HAM UNDER-DONE.

REMOVE THE SKIN, WHICH WILL READILY PEEL OFF WHEN BOILED AS DIRECTED. HAVE READY SOME DRIED BREAD OR CRACKERS OF WHICH ROLL FINE AND SIFT A TEACUP FULL. BREAK IN TWO EGGS AND STIR WELL WITH ONE TEASPOONFUL OF SUGAR. USE A LITTLE WATER IF THE EGGS DO NOT SUFFICIENTLY MOISTEN IT. SPREAD THIS EVENLY OVER THE FAT AND DRESS WITH PEPPER AND SPICES. PUT THE HAM IN A PAN WITH A WIRE BOTTOM. OR, IF THAT BE NOT AT HAND, BLOCK UP THE HAM SO THAT THE FLESH SHALL NOT REST ON THE PAN. HAVE THE OVEN HOT AND SEND THE HAM TO THE TABLE AS SOON AS IT IS BROWNED. IN CARVING, CUT IN VERY THIN SLICES.

BEYOND

BY HERVEY NEWTON.

"This book, for those who turn their eyes toward the 'land that is far off,' does for the reader what the pen pictures of travellers in the East do for people at home."—Central Baptist, St. Louis.

The author, widely known for his newspaper articles and sketches, has for years made a study of facts concerning the "other world," and finds the known facts respecting the country "Beyond," are full enough to show it superior to the most favored bits of Eden of which this world knows, a real land, with many of the conditions that give this world its charm, with many added features and enjoyable conditions.

An author widely known in the old World and the New, says:

"Those who long for a realizing sense of the joys and occupations of dear ones gone before should read BEYOND. This book is a gem in clearness, purity and brilliancy, a book of fervent devotion, of holy love, and of the comfort of the Holy Ghost."

"Intensely interesting, the style is direct, terse, vivid."—Westlyan Methodist, Syracuse.

"Will help the Christian citizen on his way to his new Country."—The Evangelist, New York.

"A healthy book on the future life."—Christian Intelligencer, New York.

A MEDICAL MISSIONARY.

Dr. George D. Dowkontt's Work among the Sick Poor of New York and in Training Medical Missionaries for Heathen Lands.

REFERENCE has frequently been made in these columns to a work of two-fold beneficence which Dr. George D. Dowkontt is doing in New York. It is an enterprise of a profoundly interesting character, and the man who initiated it and is carrying it on is a man of unique personality, whose career has been full of romantic vicissitudes. Difficulties and trials such as few men could bear have beset him all through his life; yet he has triumphed over them. He is firmly convinced that he could not have done so if God had not interposed for him. It may help some men to regain a similar faith in God's faithfulness to his promises if they know how one man has fared who has trusted his life on them. We propose, therefore, to set before our readers briefly the story of this man and his work.

A busy man in these days is Dr. Dowkontt, but a man singularly free from hurry and excitement. Quiet, self-possessed, calm, attentive to the subject in hand, prompt and firm in action. A patient, or a man in trouble, feels relieved when the Doctor has listened to his story; he confides in him spontaneously and is sure that he will receive advice well worth following. A man born to bear the burdens of others and to alleviate their woes. A man well worth knowing in all ways is Dr. Dowkontt, and there are thousands in the poverty-stricken homes of New York and many in Africa, China, Japan and other lands who would give personal and hearty confirmation of the statement.

To see the Doctor at work is worth a visit to otherwise unattractive neighborhoods. Down in Roosevelt Street is one of his haunts. It needs a strong stomach to follow him there. The street reeks with filth. The odors from the foul gutters, from the refuse lying rotting in the holes of the ill-paved roadway, from the dregs in the barrels which the saloon-keepers set out on the sidewalk to wait for the brewer's wagon, these and other horrible stenches seem to struggle with each other for predominance in that narrow, gloomy thoroughfare. The Doctor strides with quick, elastic step down the street, and the men loafing at the corners and the women from the windows look gratefully and even lovingly on him as he passes. He enters a large, roughly furnished room, where a number of poorly clad people have come to attend his levee. A motley group they are, with a strange variety of physical ailments, and the one universal spiritual ailment of sin, the fruitful parent of many afflictions. The Doctor has an eye for both kinds of trouble and he prescribes for both, but it is in dealing with the latter that he shows unbounded confidence in the remedy he prescribes.

"Your name," he asks of some new patient for whom he has prescribed, and it being given, he writes it in the Dispensary-book, with the diagnosis and treatment followed. "This is the book I keep," he explains to the thankful patient, "to enter the names of those who come for treatment. I have put your name down. Do you know that Jesus keeps a book to put names in? He calls it 'The Book of Life.' Have you had your name entered there?" "No, Doctor," the patient probably answers, "I'm afraid not." "Well, you should," is the practical reply, "it is very important, much more important than having it here. You go about it in the same way. You feel bad, you try to cure yourself, you find you can't do it, you think perhaps I can cure you, you come to me, and you find me ready to take your case."

story of sin and sorrow and is encouraged to go to the Great Physician for his soul's healing.

Dispensary work finished, the Doctor goes into gloomy sick-rooms to patients too ill to see him at the Dispensary, leaves a prescription, says a cheerful word or two, perhaps stays and prays with the sufferer and leaves a mark on some promise in a Bible for him to get comfort from, and is away to another bedside. Then apparently unaffected by fatigue, noisome air and mental labor, he is off to his home. To rest? Oh no, he is going home to work. Some eager, bright, intelligent faces become more alert when his step is heard and a crowd of young men and women look up as he enters and prepare to listen to his lecture on some department of anatomy or surgery. These are young people who are looking forward to labor in the foreign mission field, who are studying medicine under Dr. Dowkontt's supervision, are gaining experience by helping in the dispensaries and are teaching in Sunday Schools, holding services in missions and preparing for both departments of their work in heathen lands, where they are going to carry there will be no effort in the courts to break his will, when he dies. He will leave an imperishable name and a wealth of affectionate remembrance in thousands of heavy hearts, but there will be no property to divide, and those who follow him to the grave will be sincere mourners, whose grief will not be mitigated by expectation of a legacy. He has known what it is to walk several miles from the Dispensary to his home, because he had not five cents to pay car-fare, to wait around the ferry-house hoping to meet some friend who would offer to pay the two cents for the journey across the river and to make a meal on dry bread and water. Very few friends knew of this, for the Doctor was always cheerful, but now and again one or another has made the discovery. It is almost pathetic to hear the hard-working physician talk in one of his boastful moods of the provision which has always been on hand when needed, but the boasting is in his God, who has not suffered him to want. He never seems to think of the big fees he misses by attending the poor instead of the rich, of the unrequited labor of teaching, nor, except in thankfulness, of his many narrow escapes from being absolutely without food.

It was a troubled home in which George Dowkontt first saw the light, forty-eight years ago. His father was then living in exile. He was a Polish patriot, had been an officer in the army which had vainly struggled to deliver Poland from the tyranny of Russia, and escaped almost miraculously the massacre which followed defeat, had succeeded in getting to England and was maintaining himself in London. There were times when food and clothing were lacking in the exile's home and the boy, at eleven years of age, was thankful when the proprietor of a drug-store in the neighborhood, noticing his intelligence, offered him a position in the store at a salary of four shillings a week. His duties were of course those of an ordinary errand boy, but he soon learned to distinguish the drugs, to know the places where they were kept and to make himself useful to his employer by waiting on him when he was dispensing prescriptions. It was a humble beginning for the future M. D., but it was a beginning, and the boy was quick to make the best of his opportunity of acquiring knowledge. Best of all to him at that period was the joy he had of handing his earnings every Saturday to his beloved mother whose life and teaching have been a hallowed memory in his heart through the subsequent years. Two years

"That's so, sir, and thank you." "Well, there are hundreds of cases in this book that have been cured, so there is hope for you. But I can't succeed always. But if you get your name in Christ's book there is no failure. He is just as ready to welcome you as I have been, if you go to him in the same way," etc., etc. So the Doctor talks on, and the patient tells his

But all this must cost a great deal of money. Where does it come from? Is the Doctor a wealthy man? No, he is very poor, and is likely to remain so. It is safe to predict that afterward that Christian mother died. The boy heard with tearful emotion that his name was the latest on her lips and that her last words were a prayer that God would care for him and make him a good man.

Trouble followed this desolation of the home. The mother's love and devotion had

A NIGHT IN BETHLEHEM.

Dr. Talmage's latest Sunday morning sermon: "And they came with haste, and found Mary and Joseph, and the Babe lying in a manger." Luke 2 : 16.

THE black window shutters of a December night were thrown open, and some of the best singers of a world where they all sing stood there, and putting back the drapery of cloud, chanted a peace anthem, until all the echoes of hill and valley applauded and encored the Hallelujah chorus. Come, let us go into that Christmas scene as though we had never before worshipped at the manger. Here is a Madonna worth looking at. I wonder not that the most frequent name in all lands and in all Christian centuries is Mary. And there are Marys in palaces and Marys in cabins, and though German and French and Italian and Spanish and English pronounce it differently, they are all namesakes of the one whom we find on a bed of straw, with her pale face against the soft cheek of Christ in the night of the Nativity. All the great painters have tried, on canvas, to present Mary and her child and the incidents of that most famous night of the world's history. Raphael, in three different masterpieces, celebrated them. Pintoretto and Ghirlandajo surpassed themselves in the adoration of the Magi. Correggio needed to do nothing more than his Madonna to become immortal. The Madonna of the Lily, by Leonardo da Vinci, will kindle the admiration of all ages. But all the galleries of Dresden are forgotten when I think of the small room of that gallery containing the Sistine Madonna. Yet all of them were copies of St. Matthew's Madonna, and Luke's Madonna, the inspired Madonna of the Old Book, which we had put into our hands when we were infants, and that we hope to have under our heads when we die.

Behold, in the first place, that on the first night of Christ's life God honored the brute creation. You cannot get into that Bethlehem barn without going past the camels, the mules, the dogs, the oxen. The brutes of that stable heard the first cry of the infant Lord. Some of the old painters represent the oxen and camels kneeling that night before the new-born babe. And well might they kneel! Have you ever thought that Christ came among other things, to alleviate the sufferings of the brute creation? Was it not appropriate that he should, during the first few days and nights of his life on earth, be surrounded by the dumb beasts, whose moan and plaint and bellowing have for ages been a prayer to God for the arresting of their tortures and the righting of their wrongs? Not a kennel in all the centuries, not a bird's nest, not a worn-out horse on a tow-path, not a herd freezing in the poorly-built cow-pen, not a freight car in summer time bringing the beeves to market without water through a thousand miles of agony, not a surgeon's room witnessing the struggles of fox, or rabbit, or pigeon, or dog, in the horrors of vivisection, but has an interest in the fact that Christ was born in a stable, surrounded by brutes.

Standing then, as I imagine now I do, in that Bethlehem night with an infant Christ on the one side and the speechless creatures of God on the other, I cry, look out, how you strike the rowl into that horse's side. Take off that curbed bit from that bleeding mouth. Remove that saddle from that raw back. Shoot not for fun that bird that is too small for food. Forget not to put water into the cage of that canary. Throw out some crumbs to those birds caught too far north in the winter's inclemency. Arrest that man who is making that one horse draw a load heavy enough for three. Rush in upon that scene where boys are torturing a cat, or transfixing butterfly and grasshopper. Drive not off that old robin, for her nest is a mother's cradle, and under her wing there may be three or four musicians of the sky in training. In your families and in your schools, teach the coming generation more mercy than the present generation has ever shown, and in this marvellous Bible picture of the Nativity, while you point out to them the angel, show them also the camel, and while they hear the celestial chant, let them also hear the cow's moan.

Behold, also, in this Bible scene, how, on that Christmas night, God honored childhood. Childhood was to be honored by that advent. He must have a child's light limbs, and a child's dimpled hand, and a child's beaming eye, and a child's flaxen hair; and babyhood was to be honored for all time to come, and a cradle was to mean more than a grave. Mighty God! May the reflection of that one child's face be seen in all infantile faces.

Enough have all those fathers and mothers on hand if they have a child in the house. A throne, a crown, a sceptre, a kingdom, under charge. Be careful how you strike him across the head, jarring the brain. What you say to him will be centennial and millennial, and a hundred years and a thousand years will not stop the echo and re-echo. Do not say, "It is only a child." Rather say, "It is only an immortal." It is only a masterpiece of Jehovah. It is only a being that shall outlive sun and moon and star, and ages quadrillennial. God has infinite resources, and he can give presents of great value, but when he wants to give the richest possible gift to a household, he looks around all the worlds and all the universe and then gives a child. Yea, in all ages God has honored childhood. He makes almost every picture a failure unless there be a child either playing on the floor, or looking through the window, or seated on the lap, gazing into the face of the mother.

It was a child in Naaman's kitchen that told the great Syrian warrior where he might go and get cured of the leprosy, which at his seventh plunge in the Jordan, was left at the bottom of the river. It was to the cradle of leaves, in which a child was laid, rocked by the Nile, that God called the attention of history. It was a sick child that evoked Christ's curative sympathies. It was a child that Christ set in the midst of the squabbling disciples, to teach the lesson of humility. A child decided Waterloo, showing the army of Blucher how they could take a short cut through the fields, when, if the old road had been followed, the Prussian general would have come up too late to save the destinies of Europe. It was a child that decided Gettysburg, he having overheard two Confederate generals in a conversation, in which they decided to march for Gettysburg instead of Harrisburg; and this, reported to Governor Curtin, the Federal forces started to meet their opponents at Gettysburg. And to-day the child is to decide all the great battles, make all the laws, settle all the destinies, and usher in the world's salvation or destruction. Men, women, nations, all earth and all heaven, behold the child!

Notice also that in this Bible night scene God honored science. Who are the three wise men kneeling before the Divine Infant? Not boors, not ignoramuses, but Caspar, Balthasar and Melchior, men who knew all that was to be known. They were the Isaac Newtons and Herschels and Faradays of their time. Their alchemy was the forerunner of our sublime chemistry, their astrology the mother of our magnificent astronomy. And when I see these scientists bowing before the beautiful babe, I see the prophecy of the time when all the telescopes and microscopes, and all the Leyden jars, and all the electric batteries, and all the observatories, and all the universities shall bow to Jesus. It is much that way already. Where is the college that does not have morning prayers, thus bowing at the manger? Who have been the greatest physicians? Omitting the names of the living lest we should be invidious, have we not had among them Christian men like our own Joseph C. Hutchinson and Rush and Valentine Mott and Abercrombie and Abernethy? Who have been our greatest scientists? Joseph Henry, who lived and died in the faith of the Gospels, and Agassiz, who, standing with his students among the hills, took off his hat and said, "Young gentlemen, before we study these rocks, let us pray for wisdom to the God who made the rocks." All geology will yet bow before the Rock of Ages. All botany will yet worship the Rose of Sharon. All astronomy will yet recognize the Star of Bethlehem.

Behold also in that first Christmas night that God honored the fields. Come in, shepherd boys, to Bethlehem and see the child. "No," they say, "we are not dressed good enough to come in." "Yes, you are; come in." Sure enough, the storms and the night dew and the brambles have made rough work with their apparel, but none have a better right to come in. They were the first to hear the music of that Christmas night. The first announcement of a Saviour's birth was made to those men in the fields. There were wisecracks that night in Bethlehem and Jerusalem snoring in deep sleep, and there were salaried officers of government, who, hearing of it afterward, may have thought that they ought to have had the first news of such a great event, some one dismounting from a swift camel at their door and knocking till, at some sentinel's question, "Who comes there?" the great ones of the palace might have been told of the celestial arrival. No; the shepherds heard the first two bars of the music, the first in the major key and the last in the subdued minor; "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will to men." Ah, yes; the fields were honored.

The old shepherds with plaid and crook have for the most part vanished, but we have grazing—our United States pasture fields and prairie about forty-five million sheep—and all their keepers ought to follow the shepherds of my text and all those who toil in fields, all vine-dressers, all orchardists, all husbandmen. Not only that Christmas night, but all up and down the world's history God had been honoring the fields. Nearly all the messiahs of reform, and literature and eloquence and law and benevolence, have come from the fields. Washington from the fields. Jefferson from the fields. The Presidential martyrs, Garfield and Lincoln from the fields. Henry Clay from the fields. Daniel Webster from the fields. Martin Luther from the fields. Before this world is right, the overflowing populations of our crowded cities will have to take to the fields. Instead of ten merchants in rivalry as to who shall sell that one apple, we want at least eight of them to go out and raise apples. Instead of ten merchants desiring to sell that one bushel of wheat, we want at least eight of them to go out and raise wheat. The world wants now more hard hands, more bronzed cheeks, more muscular arms. To the fields! God honored them when he woke up the shepherds by the midnight anthem, and he will, while the world lasts, continue to honor the fields. When the shepherd's crook was that famous night stood against the wall of the Bethlehem khan, it was a prophecy of the time when thresher's flail and farmer's plough and woodman's axe and ox's yoke and sheaf-binder's rake shall surrender to the God who made the country, as man made the town.

Behold, also, that on that Christmas night God honored motherhood. Two angels on their wings might have brought an infant Saviour to Bethlehem without

Mary's being there at all. When the villagers, on the morning of December 26, awoke, by divine arrangement, and in some unexplained way, the Child Jesus might have been found in some comfortable cradle of the village. But no, no! Motherhood for all time was to be consecrated, and one of the tenderest relations was to be the maternal relation, and one of the sweetest words, "mother." In all ages God has honored good motherhood. John Wesley had a good mother; St. Bernard had a good mother; Samuel Budgett, a good mother; Doddridge, a good mother; Walter Scott, a good mother; Benjamin West, a good mother. In a great audience, most of whom were Christians, I asked that all those who had been blessed of Christian mothers arise, and almost the entire assembly stood up. Don't you see how important it is that all motherhood be consecrated? Why did Titian, the Italian artist, when he sketched the Madonna, make it an Italian face? Why did Rubens, the German artist, in his Madonna, make it a German face? Why did Joshua Reynolds, the English artist, in his Madonna, make it an English face? Why did Murillo, the Spanish artist, in his Madonna, make it a Spanish face? I never heard, but I think they took their own mothers as the type of Mary, the mother of Christ. When you hear some one, in sermon or oration, speak in the abstract of a good, faithful, honest mother, your eyes fill up with tears, while you say to yourself, "that was my mother."

The first word a child utters is apt to be "Mother" and the old man, in his dying dream, calls, "Mother! mother!" It matters not whether she was brought up in the surroundings of a city, and in affluent home, and was dressed appropriately, with reference to the demands of modern life, or whether she wore the old-time cap, and great round spectacles, and apron of her own make, and knit your socks with her own needles, seated by the broad fire-place, with great black log ablaze, on a winter night. It matters not how many wrinkles crossed and re-crossed her face, or how much her shoulders stooped with the burdens of a long life, if you painted a Madonna, hers would be the face. What a gentle hand she had when we were sick, and what a voice to soothe pain, and was there any one who could so fill up a room with peace, and purity, and light? And what a sad day that was when we came home and she could greet us not, for her lips were forever still. Come back, mother, this Christmas day, and take your old place, and as ten, or twenty, or fifty years ago, come and open the old Bible as you used to; read and kneel in the same place where you used to pray, and look upon us as of old when you wished us a Merry Christmas or a Happy New Year. But, no! That would not be fair to call you back. You had troubles enough, and aches enough, and bereavements enough while you were here. Tarry by the throne, mother, till we join you there, your prayers all answered, and in the eternal homestead of our God we shall again keep Christmas jubilee together. But speak from your thrones, all you glorified mothers, and say to all these, your sons and daughters, words of love, words of warning, words of cheer. They need your voice for they have travelled far and with many a heart-break since you left them, and you do well to call from the heights of heaven to the valleys of earth. Hail, enthroned ancestry! We are coming. Keep a place right beside you at the banquet.

Slow-footed years! More swiftly run
Into the gold of that unsetting sun.
Homesick we are for thee,
Calm land beyond the sea.

THE GOSPEL IN AFRICA.

Missionary Teter's Cheering Story of Progress—The Privations Endured by Christian Pioneers on the Congo.

FULL-BEARDED and stalwart, and with a face bronzed by years of exposure to an African sun, MISSIONARY J. C. TETER AND WIFE.

Missionary James Clifton Teter is now in this country, on a brief furlough before he returns to the Congo. Mr. Teter is accompanied by his wife, who has been the companion and enthusiastic helper of her devoted husband in the mission field, where they have worked together for five years. Previous to going to Africa, Mr. Teter had several years' experience in Gospel work on the Pacific Coast, at Portland, Oregon, Primesville, the Dalles, and other points, and has had many manifestations of God's wonderful providence in protecting his servants when threatened by danger or in distress.

In 1886, he went out to the Congo, under the auspices of Bishop William Taylor, and in October of that year he met at Vivi Mission Station the lady who is now his wife. After their marriage, they began work in earnest at Kimpoko, a new station, some distance from Stanley Pool. Bishop Taylor personally assisted in locating the young missionaries, and with his own hands helped to dig a drainage ditch nearly a mile in length and from two to six feet deep. He also set out for them plantains and banana trees, helped to dig up the roots, and to make a clearing for the mission-

"We had great encouragement," said Mr. Teter. "Not only was the good work spreading at Vivi, but we saw it grow at the other stations; at Mayumba, the first station on the coast; at Malange, a station south of Angola, where the church had forty members, and elsewhere. Our own work at Vivi at first was largely pioneer station-building, clearing the land and fitting up our river steamer occupying our time in addition to teaching. Now the whole of the lower Congo is being opened up to civilization, and mainly by missionary effort. There is a railroad from Vivi to Matadi. Our ground all about the Mission is cultivated and planted with a variety of produce. Just before we came away, Bishop Taylor dug out a yam (a species of native potato) that weighed thirty-nine and one-half pounds. Unless missionaries are content to do hard pioneer at first, they should not go to Africa. They should recall Brainerd's experience, when he almost starved. In India, the first missionaries had the same experience, and it is the same all over the heathen world, wherever Christianity has to make its way. Missionaries have to clear the land and cultivate it, make roads, build bridges and dwellings. The harvest of souls may not come to these pioneers, but they prepare the ground for those who come after them. This is what Bishop Taylor and his missionary helpers on the Congo have been and are still doing.

"After we got our steamer—the Annie Taylor—to rights," continued Mr. Teter, "I managed her for a time, running her on the river. Our new steamer, the Kassai, is almost ready and will greatly facilitate our work by opening up communications on the Congo. Among the mission stations thus far planted and doing well are those at Natomba, Vivi, Banana, Boma, Isangila, Matadi, Brooks Station No. 1, and Kimpoko. Wherever we plant a station we pay a good price for the land to the Belgian government. Ever since King Leopold established the Congo State, the missions have had to pay a substantial land tax, house tax—everything is taxed."

"Although spiritual progress is necessarily slow in a newly opened country," said Mrs. Teter, "there have been quite a number of ary's dwelling, working as hard as a common laborer until the task was finished.

After laboring a year among the Batokis (natives), Mr. Teter and wife went to Vivi Station, down the river, one hundred miles from Banana, at the mouth of the Congo, where they remained three or four years in charge of the mission work there. Vivi is an unhealthy post at certain seasons and both experienced severe spells of sickness. The mission work prospered and the attendance at the little chapel grew to fair proportions, the natives taking a deep interest in the Gospel, conversions, and the outlook is very encouraging. Mission work there calls for the utmost patience and perseverance. At Malange Station, on the West Coast, there were many converts. Miss Bertha Mead, who was teacher there, and who is now dead, was a beautiful type of the Christian teacher. While she lay dying, a native girl sat by, holding her hand. "Don't go! Don't leave me!" she cried. "I don't know how the school can be carried on." Her mantle seemed to fall upon this poor black girl, and she is now teaching the school at Malange with remarkable success. It is a pleasant sight to see one of our native schools in session. The children have learned to sing some of our most familiar hymns. Here is the opening verse of "Jesus Loves Me" in the native tongue:

Jisas watuzoleli;
Nkanda wa tu tela wo;
Zintoudi zandi
Bena muna moko mandli.

CHORUS.
Inga! Jisu watuzoleli!
Inga! Jisu watuzoleli!
Inga! Jisu watuzoleli!
Nkanda watutela wo.

"At Vivi" continued Mrs. Teter, "there was another convert—a little boy named Saba.

STANLEY'S OLD STONE PRISON.

He was brought to Christ in 1887. Some time ago he was attacked by the fatal sleeping sickness—a disease that carries off many victims in Africa, and which seems to deprive the sufferer of all his energies and lulls him to his death. He sleeps nearly all the time. A few days before Saba died, we visited him. He told us he loved Jesus and was not afraid to die."

During his life on the Congo, Mr. Teter had the pleasure of meeting Herbert Ward, Roger Casement and Mr. Glave, the first-named famous by reason of his connection with the exploration of Stanley, and the two latter known as traders and explorers on the Congo and its tributaries, having penetrated far beyond the settled stations, into the country of the cannibal Lufembi and the elephant-hunting tribes. Mr. Glave was the bearer of a letter from Bishop Taylor at Stanley Pool to Mr. Teter. One of the now historic landmarks along the Congo is the old fort, erected and used by Stanley as a prison during his early explorations, an illustration of which appears on this page. Other illustrations are portraits of Mr. and Mrs. Teter and a scene at one of the most important stations on the river Congo.

Both Mr. and Mrs. Teter speak enthusiastically of Bishop Taylor's readiness to aid and encourage his workers, and of his care of the missionaries generally. They contradict the stories told by some who have left the mission field, after proving their unfitness for the work involved. Mr. Teter will go to London to witness the trial trip of the new steamer Kassai and will then superintend its packing and transfer to Stanley Pool, after which he will run it as the mission boat on the river Kassai. Both he and his devoted wife look forward hopefully to the early renewal of their work for Christ on the Congo.

OBSCURE MARTYRS.

THEY have no place in storied page.
No rest in marble shrine;
They are passed and gone with a perished age:
They died and "made no sign."
But work that shall find its wages yet,
And deeds that their God did not forget,
Done for their love divine—
These were the mourners, and these shall be
The crowns of their immortality.

O! seek them not where sleep the dead,
Ye shall not find their trace:
No graven stone is at their head,
No green grass hides their face;
But sad and unseen is the silent grave—
It may be the sand or the deep, sad wave,
Or a lonely desert place;
For they need no prayers and no mourning
bell,
They were tombed in true hearts that knew them well.

They healed sick hearts till their's were broken,
And dried sad eyes till their's lost light;
We shall know at last by a certain token
How they fought and fell in the fight.
Salt tears of sorrow unhealed,
Passionate cries unchronicled,
And silent strifes for the right—
Angels shall count them, and earth shall sigh
That she left her best children to battle and die.

A SONG OF SALVATION.

S. S. Lesson For Jan. 10. By Mrs M. Baxter
Isa. 26: 1-10. Golden Text, Isa. 26: 4.

THE Word of God is a Book of song as well as a Book of instruction, edification and comfort; of judgment and of prophecy. We have many songs in the Word of God. There is Moses' and Miriam's song of deliverance when the children of Israel had crossed the Red Sea (Exod. 15: 1-21); there is Hannah's song when God had heard her cry, and given to her a prophet son (1. Sam. 2: 1-10); there is Deborah's song when God had given deliverance to Israel (Judges 5); there are the songs of Zacharias and Elizabeth; there is Mary's song; there are songs of angels and of the redeemed; there are songs of God over his beloved people and David's songs and those of other psalmists about the Lord.

This song is the song of Judah when God shall have brought his people back into their own land, and when they can be called once again: "The righteous nation which keepeth the truth." For more than two thousand five hundred years, God's ancient people have been passing through judgment, but God will surely bring them back again, and the way of his blessing is frequently through judgment. The time shall come when in the mountain of Zion "The face of the covering cast over all people, and the veil that is spread over all nations," shall be swallowed up, or taken away, and the nations shall acknowledge their God, and they shall know God's love for Israel. Then he will swallow up death in victory, and the Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces; and the rebuke of his people shall he take away from off all the earth; for the Lord hath spoken it," (chap. 25: 7, 8.) It is who shall bring again Zion. When the Lord Jehovah shall conquer death, shall "swallow up death in victory" by taking away his people who are ready for him, to meet him in the air, then his ancient people, shall as a people, also be fully resurrected; and be no longer like a valley of dry bones but "an exceeding great army." (Ex. 37.) "And it shall be said in that day, Lo, this is our God; we have waited for him, and he will save us: this is the Lord: we have waited for him, we will be glad and rejoice in his salvation," (25: 9.) A waiting time generally precedes a rejoicing time; listening to God lays the foundation for coming victory.

Up to the present time the people of Israel have been doing their best to establish themselves on earth, to become rich and powerful, often in a way which has merited the rebuke of nations where they have been scattered. Until the present time, it can hardly be said that, as a nation, they have waited for the Lord, but everything is coming to a crisis in the history of the Jews as a people. Few intelligent Jews can be found who have not read the New Testament. Many of them are deeply struck with its contents, and a preparation is being made for this very waiting for the Lord which precedes the gladness and rejoicing in his salvation.

"In that day shall this song be sung in the land of Judah: We have a strong city." We can estimate what it must mean for a scattered people, who have had no land and no city to call their own for so many ages, when they can assert once more "We have a strong city." The Jews have only been tolerated in the lands where they have sojourned. They are strangers, but the times is coming when they shall say: "We have a strong city; salvation will God appoint for walls and bulwarks."

But Judah's song is the song also of all those who have waited for the Lord. As the coming of Christ draws near, his people are more conscious how fully they are pilgrims and strangers down here. Like Noah's dove, there is no rest for the sole of our feet in earthly places when once we have got a foothold in the heavenly places in Christ Jesus. Once having accepted our citizenship in heaven, we are not so anxious to preserve our citizenship down here. The unrighteousness in government and social life, only makes us long the more for the coming of our Lord. We, too, have a "strong city," but it is a city which hath foundations whose Builder and Maker is God. The bulwarks of earthly cities, bear witness to the strength of man's self-defence, taking all his ingenuity to make himself secure; but God's city has other bulwarks: his salvation, his deliverance, and that salvation has its roots in the precious blood of Jesus. No safety for God's city except as we are saved through the blood of Christ. The gates of that city open only to "the righteous nation which keepeth the truth." He whose unrighteousness is forgiven and whose sin is covered must have a spirit in which "there is no guile;" he who is a citizen of God's city, fortified by salvation, must be righteous and keep the truth.

"Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace, whose mind is stayed on thee: because he trusteth in thee." The only true foundation of peace is to be on God's side at every moment and in every circumstance. A mind stayed on God sees his hand at work, and does not misunderstand him. Everything may go the crossing his expectations, crossing his will, crossing his judgment, but he will learn to say: "All is well, my God makes no mistake." His mind, or imagination, being stayed on God, does not riot in conjuring up possible or probable difficulties which might weigh upon his spirit more, perhaps, than actual facts. He does not spend his time calculating the contingencies which may arise, or work himself into a fever about things which may never happen. All these apprehensions of evil, all this imagination is hushed in the presence of our God. He knows that is peace. Joseph could be in peace in Potiphar's house and in the prison because he trusted in God; Daniel could be at peace in the den of lions, David could be at peace when Shimei cursed him, because these men of God saw the mighty controlling hand of him "who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will." They knew that he was too real a Father to expect of them an endurance which he should not give them; they knew that they could count on him as they could not have done on any human being. "God is our refuge and strength; a very present help in trouble; therefore will we not fear though the earth be removed," so long as God is on our side, we have almightiness, all love, all wisdom to count upon.

"Trust ye in the Lord forever; for in the Lord Jehovah is everlasting strength," or "the Lord Jehovah is the Rock of ages." And he who builds his house on such a rock can defy the tempest on whatsoever side it may come. Up to the present time the Jews, as a people, have trusted in their financial talent, their cunning, their knowledge of business, and God has not been in all their thoughts. O what a complete reformation it will be when this money-loving Jew shall trust in the Lord, the Rock of Ages.

"He bringeth down them that dwell on high; the lofty city, he layeth it low; he layeth it low even to the ground; he bringeth it even to the dust." It is a law of God's Kingdom that every high thing must be abased, every strong thing brought down, every wise thing made foolish; and therefore the lofty city called in chapter 24: 10, "the city of confusion," must be brought down. No doubt it meant Babylon, but may it not mean for us the city of this world and everything in the world which savors of lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, "the pride of life," everything which takes the place of God in the human heart! Whatever we glory in or seek credit for, even though it be our work for God, it must be brought down.

God says: The foot shall tread it down, even the feet of the poor, and the steps of the needy. The stripling David, the young farmer Gideon, such are God's mighty ones. It is not the foot of the mighty warrior who treads down in the name of his God, but "the feet of the poor and the steps of the needy;" those who know their nothingness and are conscious of their weakness, and so they trust in God to work deliverance for them. O how little it matters what strength we have, or what resources may be on our side, if the mighty God has made bare his arm on our behalf!

"The way of the just is uprightness; thou, most upright dost weight the path of the just." It is not Belshazzar alone who has been weighed in the balance of the sanctuary. Once in wrath God put him in the scale and found him wanting. But there is a day by day weighing of "the path of the just" by our loving, tender Father. Every incident, every sorrow, every temptation is weighed with the utmost exactness and the exact measure of power to endure is given with the trial. O why should we be afraid to go into the fire when he who tests the heat of it walks with his children in the midst? Why should we be afraid to go through the waters when the ark of the covenant of our God is the guarantee that they shall not overwhelm us? Why should we be afraid of the strife of tongues when the hand of our God has power to silence all those who rise up against us? O let us thank our God that not one step can be by chance. Perfect love and perfect wisdom weigh out our measure as the hours pass.

O let us learn to understand the ways of our God, and how fully it answers to wait for him, then our career will be every day one of unbroken peace, because we behold the majesty of the Lord and our mind is stayed on him.

LESSON POINTS.

Especially Adapted to the Requirements of the Desk.

THOU wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee. A ship's compass is so adjusted as to keep its level amidst all the heavings of the sea. Though forming part of a structure that feels every motion of the restless waves, it has an arrangement of its own that keeps it always in place, and in working order. Look at it when you will, it is pointing—trembling, perhaps, but ever true—to the pole. So each soul in this life needs an adjustment of its own, that amid the fluctuations of the "earthen vessel" it may be kept ever to feel the power of its great attraction in the skies. This the perfect peace—spoken of in the text supplies. Amid the dreary noises of this world, amid its cares and tears; amid its hot contentions, ambitions and disappointments, it affords an inner calm like the serene ocean depths, to which the influence of the wild winds and waves can never come.

"Put me down," said a wounded soldier in the Crimea, to his comrades, who were carrying him, "put me down; do not take the trouble to carry me any farther; I am dying." They put him down and returned to the field. A few minutes after an officer saw the man weltering in his blood and said to him: "Can I do anything for you?" "Nothing, thank you." "Shall I get you a little water?" said the kind-hearted officer. "No, thank you, I am dying." "Is there nothing I can do for you? Shall I write to your friends?" "I have no friends that you can write to; but there is one thing for which I would be much obliged. In my knapsack you will find a Bible. Please open it at the twenty-sixth chapter of Isaiah, and near the beginning of the chapter you will find a verse that speaks of peace; will you read it?" The officer did so and read the words: "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee." "Thank you, sir," said the dying man, "I have that peace—I am going to my Saviour—God is with me—I want no more," and instantly expired.

Trust ye in the Lord forever, for in the Lord Jehovah is everlasting strength. Trust with a childlike dependence upon God, and you shall fear no evil; for be assured that even "if the enemy comes in like a flood, the Spirit of the Lord will lift up a standard against him."

One day Miss Dix, so well known for her philanthropic journeyings and visitations among the prisoners and the distressed, was conversing with a lady concerning her mission and the trials of the way. "Are you not afraid," said the lady, "to travel all over the country alone? Have you not encountered dangers, and been in perilous situations?" "I am naturally timid," said Miss Dix; "and diffident like all my sex, but in order to carry out my purpose I know it is necessary to make sacrifices and encounter dangers. While in my travels through different States I have been in perilous situations. I will mention one which occurred in the state of Michigan. I had hired a carriage and driver to convey me some distance through an uninhabited portion of the country. In starting I discovered that the driver, a young lad, had a pair of pistols with him. Inquiring what he was doing with arms, he said he carried them to protect us, as he had heard that robberies had been committed on that road. I said to him, 'Give me the pistols. I'll take care of them.' He did so reluctantly. In pursuing our journey, through a dismal-looking forest, a man rushed into the road, caught the horses by the bridle, and demanded my purse. I said to him with as much self-possession as I could command: 'Are you not ashamed to rob a woman? I have but little money, and that I want to defray my expenses in visiting prisons and poor-houses, and occasionally in giving to objects of charity. If you have been unfortunate, are in distress, and in want of money I will give you some.' While thus speaking to him, I discovered his countenance changing, and he became deathly pale. 'Oh,' he exclaimed, 'that voice,' and immediately told me he had been in the Philadelphia penitentiary and had heard me comforting some of the prisoners in adjoining cells, and that he now recognized my voice. He then desired me to pass on and expressed deep sorrow at the outrage he had committed, but I drew out my purse and said to him: 'I will give you something to help you until you can get into honest employment.' He declined at first taking anything, until I insisted on his doing so, for fear he might be tempted to rob some one else, before he could secure work." It is better to trust in the Lord than to put confidence in princes or in pistols. Had the driver kept his pistols and used them, Miss Dix and he might have been murdered. The power of a Christian woman's voice melted the heart, which resistance might have steeled for deeds of vengeance and destruction.

THE PRAYER-WHEEL AT OURGA.

M. R. JULIUS M. PRICE, the special correspondent of the Illustrated London News, in his journey across Mongolia, stopped at the sacred city of Ourga, the headquarters of Mongolian Buddhism. In describing what he saw in this city, he mentions, as a curiosity, the numerous "prayer-wheels," under rough wooden sheds, erected in the principal open places in the city. Some of them are very large, so that several persons can pray together; others are smaller. All are inscribed with prayers to Buddha, and the more they are turned the more religious they are supposed to make one. Many devout persons, especially among the old people, turn smaller wheels held in the left hand while manipulating the large one with the right hand. The Mongolian pilgrim, on the street, carries in his right hand a "prayer-banner;" in his left hand a pot containing millet seed, with which he besprinkles those who give him offerings.

Apart from the wheels are the "prayer-boards," also placed for public use in various parts of the city, and on which are continually to be seen prostrate figures lying on their faces, and thus literally humbling themselves to the very dust. From a little distance, these boards presented the appearance of a spring-board in a swimming-bath. The whole action of the people using them was exactly like that of a person preparing to make a run along the board and take a "header," rather than a prelude to a devotional exercise.

Mr. Price says: "Ourga is a strangely religious place to live in. Everywhere, at the most unexpected places, at all times, one often sees people throwing themselves suddenly face downward, full length upon the ground, saying their prayers just as the fit took them, I suppose; these curious proceedings attracting no attention. Many a time I have been riding quietly along, when all of a sudden my horse would be made to swerve violently by some hideous old man or woman, who was seized with an irresistible impulse to say a prayer just in front of the horse. And their devotions do not end here, for every "yourt," however humble, not only contains a family wheel, but is decorated outside with innumerable prayer-flags, or rather bits of rag, tied on to strings suspended from poles all round the palisades. Till I was informed what they were, I took them for bird-scares, for they could not even by the wildest stretch of the imagination, be taken for flags."

A SIGN OF THE TIMES.

Dr. R. W. Dale, the President of the recent World's Conference of Congregational ministers, one of the ablest living theologians and an acute observer of current events, recently said, in the course of an address, that all the signs of the times in the church and the world indicate that there will shortly be "such a revelation of the power of the Saviour as has not been witnessed since Pentecost."

APOCALYPTIC PRECIS.

The Plan of the Book and the Order of the Series of Revelations.

BY PASTOR J. L. FULLER.*

IN former articles (published in this journal on November 25 and December 2) we traced the succession of events as developed and revealed in the chapters of the book of Revelation up to the sixteenth chapter. This showed us the victorious course of the Gospel through the world and the outbreak of war, famine and pestilence. The last result of the victory of the Gospel is the conversion of Israel, not that of individuals only, but of the whole race. This brings us to

of God; but here, also, grows Satan's rage. Cast down from heaven, where he can no longer appear as Israel's accuser, he tries to annihilate it. But, by its return to its own country, it will be secured against him. He meditates revenge. The one Church, the chosen people of the Lord, is secured against him; but there are innumerable bodies of Christians dispersed throughout the Gentile world. These are the first to suffer, though he does not give up the idea of the future destruction of Israel. To this end he calls up the Worldly Power, gives it a ruler raised from the dead, shows him to the world through the lying prophet, whom he endows with miraculous powers, as their Saviour, and establishes the worship of the Antichrist in opposition to that of Christ the Son of God. Whoever refuses to join in this worship, his life is forfeited. Thus the world is ready to root out Christianity from the earth. Three and a half years wages the rage of the Satanic inspired world-power, and side by side with it proceed the judgments of God; at first mildly and measuredly, then becoming ever sharper and more severe; at first calling to repentance, in the end crushing.

The Vials.

In the first category we place the four first trumpet-sounds. Then, as these are without their effect, the plagues become more severe, and take the character of being directly aimed woes; in other words, the trumpet woes now pass over into those of the vials. With the Fifth Trumpet, or the First Vial, there begins a terrible torture for men, lasting five months, exclusively for those who bear the mark of the beast. Having marked themselves with the mark, God now marks them with a noisome and torturing sore. As they have boycotted all true believers, God now puts an end to all intercourse between them by means of the Second Wrath-Vial. As they have shed blood like water, now (Third Vial) water for them shall be turned into blood. As they have inflicted all manner of tortures upon the believers, they are now under the heat of the Fourth Vial, to get a foretaste of all the tortures of hell. As they have worshipped the Beast as their god, the darkness proceeding from its throne (Sixth Trumpet and Fifth Vial) is to show them what salvation their god brings them. If they have found their happiness in the enjoyments and the glories of the World-City, the judgment now destroys and reduces that city to ruins.

The Two Witnesses.

They are many, and often most terrible, the judgments that will fall upon the Kingdom of the Antichrist. They to some extent explain a difficulty. In chap. 11 we see the Holy City in the possession of the gentile world, and yet the Church of God remains preserved. But how was it possible that Jerusalem should be in the power of the Antichristian power and yet the Church should so long remain unhurt? This is explained by these frequent, and often so very severe, Judgment Woes, which always keep that power in fear and dread. The eleventh chapter indicates this where it relates the extraordinary miraculous powers given to the two prophets; and in the joy of the world at their death, "because they had tormented those that dwell on the earth." We have the proof that they were the wall and the defence, against the attacks of the enemy which thus suffered defeat. We may then well be entitled to say, that the plagues which these two prophets called down from heaven, are Judgment Woes, which were pictured to us in the Trumpets and the Vials, and we understand how such judgments were able to hold that power so long in dismay.

A NIGHT RUSH.

A STRANGE scene was witnessed in Oklahoma Territory on the night of Dec. 18. Secretary Noble's decision added one hundred and forty acres to the town of Guthrie and whoever was first on the land after midnight could claim a lot. Thousands of people were waiting and when the hour struck there was a wild rush. When the sun rose, seven lots were plowed, miles of wire fence had been set up and log huts were going up in all directions. There were about ten claimants for every one of the best lots. All the following day, huts were being hauled to the land on trolleys, tents made their appearance here and there, and the work of fencing was pushed forward vigorously. There were several fights, many men coming armed and being met by prior claimants similarly prepared to defend their claims. A spectator said that in less than a week a fair-sized town would stand where there had been nothing but pasture-land. It is much to be wished that like eagerness were evinced to take advantage of the offer which God makes through Christ of a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. (II. Cor. 5: 1.)

THE LIFE-SAVERS' CODE.

FORMAL adoption has now been made of the recommendations of the International Maritime Congress which was held some time ago in Washington. They now go into effect at all the United States Life-Saving Stations, and the shipping houses have been supplied with books explaining the signals and modes of operating the life-lines. The signals are few and easily understood. A red light on shore will signify to a vessel in distress, "You are seen and assistance is coming;" a white and red light together will mean, "Do not attempt to land in your own boats; it is impossible," and so on with other combinations. The Service has met with great annoyance in times past owing to its inability to obtain co-operation from persons on stranded vessels. The book now issued will, it is hoped, remove this difficulty, also. It contains full instructions concerning the use to be made of the small line thrown to the vessel by the shore gun, and the hawser that is afterward sent to the wreck bears a tag written in several languages describing the place to which it is to be made fast, etc. The instructions are devised to prevent misunderstanding between those who want to be saved and those who want to save them. Unhappily, people in danger of spiritual shipwreck do not always want to be saved, but those who do are in need of analogous cautions to insure co-operation. The caution most frequently needed in such cases is that which the life-savers indicate with the red and white light; for the first impulse of the awakened sinner generally is to make the futile attempt to save himself. (Rom. 4: 5.)

A FATAL REMEDY.

IN a farm house near Wichita, Kan., the family is suffering from a double bereavement. Its members consisted of the farmer and his wife, several children and the farmer's father who had been a country doctor in his younger days, but had retired from practice many years ago and was spending his declining days with his son's family. He was eighty-five years of age but was still active. Two or three weeks ago the farmer's eldest daughter was prostrated with an attack of grip. The old man, who loved her dearly, prescribed bleeding. It had been his favorite treatment when he was practising medicine and he had unbounded faith in it, as his contemporaries had. His son, however, knew that modern doctors had generally abandoned the practice and he would not allow his daughter to be bled. The old man persisted, and declared that the girl's life was being sacrificed, when she might be cured as he had cured hundreds in his time. But the farmer was firm and as the girl got worse he drove off to the nearest town to get a doctor. During his absence his father seized the opportunity to apply his remedy. His eyesight was not good, or his hand may have been unsteady. He opened a main artery in the girl's arm and when the farmer returned, he found his daughter dead, and his father lying in a swoon on the floor by her bed. The latter was restored to consciousness, but when he found that his beloved granddaughter was really dead the shock was too severe for him to bear. He fell back in his chair, groaned heavily and died. Thus two lives were lost through one man's over-confidence in his own knowledge and skill. It is a dangerous disposition to have and is apt to work mischief in spiritual as well as in temporal matters. Many a soul has been misled and some driven to despair by a dogmatic interpretation and application of a passage of Scripture, by men honest in intention but mistaken in their opinions, "wresting" as Peter said, "the Scriptures to their own destruction." (II. Peter 3: 16.)

A SURGEON'S LIABILITY.

THE Court of Appeals, at Albany, N.Y., gave judgment on December 17, on an important case sent up from the Court below. It was the appeal of a hospital surgeon who had been sued by a patient for malpractice and had been condemned to pay heavy damages. The patient was a tramp whose foot had been crushed by the cars. He was sent to the hospital for treatment. The surgeon did not think it would be possible to save the foot, and recommended amputation. But the patient was reluctant to undergo the operation and other remedies were tried. After a few days gangrene set in and an operation was hastily performed to save the man's life. The leg was amputated at the ankle, but the surgeon did not perceive how far the gangrene had spread, and in a short time a second operation became necessary and the man's leg was cut off at the knee. He contended that he had suffered by the surgeon's want of skill and care, and that if the first operation had been made promptly there would have been no need of the second. The surgeon pleaded in defence that the first operation had been delayed at the man's own request. The Court decided that the surgeon must pay the damages, as he was supposed to know better than the patient what was necessary to a cure. The decision carries a lesson to those who are engaged in the cure of souls. It often happens that the anxious soul has some darling sin or evil association which he cannot bear to part with, but it is the duty of the servant of Christ who is directing him to warn him that only by giving up the sins that are as dear to him as a right hand or a right eye can he be saved. (Matt. 5:29,30.)

TWO YEARS' LABOR LOST.

AN escape of prisoners from the penitentiary at Waupun, Wis., is reported by a local journal. The labor involved was enormous, and considerable ingenuity was expended upon it. It appears that three of the prisoners were employed in the wash-house. All had long sentences to serve, and they consulted together on the possibility of making their escape. They managed to get to a high part of the building, from which they could see the direction taken by the walls and, having made a rough plan, they decided that it was possible to make a tunnel to the open country. At one end of the wash-house was a well, and that they fixed on for the starting point. They easily removed the stones from one of its sides, a few feet below the surface, and there commenced the tunnel. Only one man could work at it at a time, and they took turns at it when they were not watched. It was over a hundred feet long, and when they struck the wall of the shops, and again at the outer wall, they had to dig down deeper to get below the foundations. It was very laborious work, owing to their being unable to get proper tools. They continued it, however, toiling at it at every opportunity. Day after day for two years, they labored and at last the outer wall was reached and the excavation completed. A few days ago an opportunity occurred for making use of this subterranean exit. The three men crawled through and were free. Snow was falling but they did not mind that and they set out for the open country. For an hour or two they made good progress, but then the strength of the oldest of the three failed and he sank to the ground unable to go farther. The others took him up and carried him to a farm-house where all three slept that night. They awoke early and prepared to resume their flight, but their escape had been discovered and their tracks in the snow had been followed. They were speedily recaptured and taken back to the penitentiary. It must have been grievously disappointing to them after their two long years of hard toil. How gladly such men would have avoided that labor and the chances of recapture if the Governor had been willing to pardon them! But they knew there was no prospect of that. It is otherwise with Satan's captives whom he binds with the shackles of their own passions and appetites. They frequently go through long and painful struggles to deliver themselves only, like these men, to fall back again into bondage, though they are assured that God is ready to pardon and receive them just as they are. (Matt. 9: 13.)

A CHILD'S RIGHTS.

WHEN the immigration commissioner inspected the steerage passengers on the Origen which arrived at New York on Dec. 15, from Brazil, he found among them a widow and her son, a little boy about three years old. On questioning the mother he found that she was a German and had no money. He told her that she would not be allowed to land as the law forbade the landing of immigrants who were liable to become a public charge. She must return to Brazil on the Origen. The widow was grievously disappointed and pleaded hard to be allowed to remain. She said there was no prospect of her earning a living in Brazil. But the commissioner was inflexible. She told a sad story. Some four years ago she and her husband came to this country and, after remaining here a few months, went to Brazil where he sickened and died. When the expenses of his illness and funeral were paid, there was only enough of their savings left to pay their passage to New York. She mentioned incidentally that her little boy was born in New York. Instantly, the commissioner's manner changed and he told her she might remain. Her son had a right to enter his native land and, as the law forbids the separation of a family, the boy's right insured the admission of his mother. The incident may serve as an illustration of the way in which the Christian is assured of admission to heaven. He has no right of his own, but his union with Christ gives him a right which will surely be recognized. Christ's prayer will be answered that they whom the Father had given him should be with him where he is and behold his glory. (John 17: 24.)

A LAWYER'S OFFER.

BENEFITS that come from the friendship of railroad magnates formed the subject of conversation at a recent public dinner in Philadelphia, of which a report appears in the Record of that city. Ex-Attorney-General Wayne Mac Veagh, who was one of the guests, was particularly enthusiastic on the subject, dwelling on the advantage to the pocket and in personal comfort which came from travelling on a pass. A clergyman, who was one of the company, expressed his surprise and said he had understood that the use of passes was chiefly confined to men on professional journeys, and was not aware that wealthy gentlemen were in the habit of using them. For his own part he had never used a pass in his life. "But you should do so," rejoined the lawyer, who possibly did not know the speaker, and added, "I shall take great pleasure in using my influence to procure you a pass over the Pennsylvania road at any time, if you'll use yours in return to obtain for me the same privilege over the road in which you are interested." The clergyman looked sadly at the lawyer for a moment, and then said: "I am afraid there is some misunderstanding in your mind. There is only one road in which I am interested and that is one you are not likely to want to travel over." The clergyman could not have supposed that the lawyer did not care to reach the destination to which the road he referred to leads. He probably had in mind our Lord's description of the narrow way (Matt. 7: 13, 14), and thought that the lawyer belonged to the numerous class who live for the world but, like Balaam, desire to "die the death of the righteous" and wish their end to be like his. (Numbers 23: 10.)

TAKE THE COMFORT.

TWO or three years ago I was at Long Branch. I stood on the beach, looking off upon the sea; and there was a strong wind blowing, and noticed that some of the vessels were going that way and other vessels were going another way. I said to myself, "How is it that the same wind sends one vessel in one direction and another vessel in another direction?" I found out by looking that it was the different way they had the sails set. And so does trouble come on this world. Some men it drives into the harbor of heaven, and other men it drives on the rocks. It depends upon the way you have your sails set. All the Atlantic and Pacific oceans of surging sorrow cannot sink a soul that has asked for God's pilotage. The difficulty is that when we have misfortunes of any kind we put them in God's hand, and they stay there a little while; and then we go and get them again, and bring them back. A vessel comes in from a foreign port. As it comes near the harbor it sees a pilot floating about. It hails the pilot. The pilot comes on board, and he says, "Now, captain, you have had a stormy passage. Go down and sleep, and I will take the vessel into New York harbor." After a while the captain begins to think, "Am I right in trusting this vessel to that pilot? I guess I'll go up and see." So he comes to the pilot, and says, "Don't you see that rock? Don't you see those headlands? You will wreck the ship. Let me lay hold the helm for a while for myself, and then I'll trust to you." The pilot becomes angry, and says, "I will either take care of this ship or not. If you want to, I will get into my yawl and go ashore, or back to my boat." Now we say to the Lord, "O God, take my life, take my all, in thy keeping. Be thou my guide; be thou my pilot." We go along for a little while, and suddenly wake up, and say, "Things are going all wrong. O Lord, we are driving on these rocks, and thou art going to let us be shipwrecked." God says, "You go and rest; I will take charge of this vessel, and take it into the harbor." It is God's business to comfort, and it is our business to be comforted.

JANUARY BILLS.

AMONG the storms of winter, and especially a storm that seldom fails to visit every locality about the first of January—is a shower of bills. How they come in—these great snowflakes,—and they stick and stare at you till they are paid, and stick and stare at you when they are paid. Among the multitude of resolutions formed for the new year about to open, there is no better one than a resolve to pay as you go. It seems passing strange that the payment of debts should be inculcated upon professing Christians, and yet is there any evil habit to which Christian men are more addicted than that of incurring debt which they cannot discharge at maturity? And the causes of this condition of things are many and multi-form. Sometimes it is the result of a weak desire to live in a style beyond one's means. Oftentimes it is the result of thoughtlessness, or a general unwillingness to systematize one's expenditures. Often it proceeds from a free-heartedness and a desire to do for others, especially for the family, more than one's circumstances admit; and not infrequently it is owing to a spirit of extravagance which is a legitimate inheritance from father to son. But whatever the cause may be, as a general rule debt can be avoided and much unhappiness saved. To do this, above all firmly resolve to live within your means, however limited they may be; make no promises which you have not a reasonable certainty of keeping; be firm in applying whatever money you may have on hand to the liquidation of some debt in whole or in part, and above all avoid, so far as possible, contracting a future obligation wherewith to pay a present one.

And in your purchases: when you want that for which you cannot pay at the time, wait till you can, before procuring it, and when you do get it, you will enjoy it all the more for the sacrifice which it has cost. There is a true nobility in denying yourself that which you cannot afford, which will increase your own self-respect, and raise you in the estimation of your friends. "Do you see this addition which I have just put up?" said a friend, in our hearing, not long ago. "I was offered a loan on my house; but no, I thought I would wait. I did wait. Things which I wanted I denied myself. Finally I accumulated sufficient to pay for my improvements. They cost more than the carpenter's and mason's bills: they cost a spirit of sacrifice; and don't you suppose I enjoy it all the more for this?" And he was right.

Nor do we forget that there are some who cannot pay; there are those who, unfortunate in business, simply cannot meet their obligations. They have bought on a falling market; their good name is unscathed though their credit has been dishonored by those who had engaged to protect it; parties owing them have failed to pay them, and bankruptcy stares them in the face. But for all that—and you can find such people everywhere—you do not doubt them, you are drawn to them in their misfortune as you never were in their prosperity; you are only too glad to do all in your power to help them, and in so doing discharge only a simple Christian duty. It is not of such that we speak.

Debt: there is no worse demoralizer of character. The sad records of defaulting, embezzling, and dishonest failures which we meet with so constantly in the daily press are often, indeed most frequently, the result of the demoralization of debt, and consequent desperate efforts at extrication. The financial props have given way. The little debt, which at first was as small as a grain of mustard seed, like the rolling snow-ball, has gathered weight and multiplied itself a thousandfold. And still it grows, and like the fabulous hydra which Hercules was sent to kill, you no sooner strike off one head than two shoot up in its place. The struggle is severe, but in the end decisive: either confession is made of a hopeless bankruptcy which might and should have been avoided, or integrity is sacrificed to the temptation of the moment. Debt ruins as many households, and destroys as many fine characters as rum; it is the devil's mortgage on the soul, and he is always ready to foreclose. Pay your grocer; pay your pew bills; pay your minister. Be indebted for nothing but love, and even that be sure you pay in kind, and that your payments are frequent: we especially commend this advice to old bachelors.

BRIEF NOTES.

We thank John Owens, of Philadelphia, for directing our attention to an obvious error in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD advertisement, published in The Youth's Companion of Dec. 24, 1891. The compositor transposed the two head-lines which are above the offers made. The words "For Two Dollars," which appear on the right, over the offer of the Olive Wood, should have been on the left, over the offer of the Oxford Teacher's Bible. The line "For $1.50," which appears on the left, over the Bible offer, should have been on the right over the offer of the Olive Wood. Readers of ordinary intelligence will not be misled by this mechanical error.

The next issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will contain a complete synopsis of the opening chapters of "Aleph the Chaldean," bringing the story down to date for the benefit of new subscribers who have not read the earlier portion of Rev. Dr. Burr's wonderfully attractive story.

Rev. Arthur Crane of West Medford, Mass., has just concluded a very successful series of Revival meetings at New Market, N. H., all churches participating. He is now laboring at Rockland, Me., with excellent results.

Evangelist J. H. Weber, of Ohio, has been holding services at Perry Street M. E. Church, New York. He was heartily assisted by the officers and members of the church and there was a time of great blessing. Many were seeking Christ who have found peace.

A letter just received from Bishop William Taylor states that he has arrived safely in Sierra Leone. He travelled with the Anglo-French Boundary Commissioners, who have gone to Africa to survey the lines of frontier between the English and French territories.

An address by Rev. J. Diaz whose portrait, with an account of his work in Cuba, appeared in this journal last week, may be obtained by addressing Mr. J. S. Paine, 48 Canal Street, Boston, Mass., enclosing a two cent stamp for postage. In this address Mr. Diaz gives further particulars of his labors on the island.

The system of Bible reading, about which some of our subscribers have written us inquiries, covers the whole Bible in three years. It is prepared by Rev. J. L. Campbell, pastor of the Lexington Ave. Baptist Church, New York. Full particulars may be obtained by addressing him, enclosing stamps for reply, at 1852 Lexington Ave., New York, N. Y.

Contributions to the relief of the Baptist Church at Kingston, Pa., for which an appeal was made in this journal on Dec. 2, have been received as follows: W. W. Smallwood, Kansas City, $2; G. E. Jones, Toronto, $1; E. Bardsley, Virginia, Ill., $2; D. N. Crane, Newark, N. J., 50 cents; S. A. Harden, Smith's Valley, Ind., $2; J. M. Hanley, Paxton Mills, Ill., $5; J. F. Dodd, Delaware, O., $1.

Rev. W. T. Lambourne is now laboring in Boston, Mass., at the Tabernacle of which Rev. Dr. Denning is pastor. He is having great success, not a service passes without some souls being brought to conviction and finding peace in Christ. Mr. Lambourne has also on week evenings, been helping Dr. Smith at Weymouth, who is doing a grand work in that delightful Boston suburb.

Rev. E. P. Telford has concluded the meetings, he has been holding in Providence, R. I. Two Methodist churches joined in the work, both of which have received large additions to their membership. On December 27, he commenced services in the Mount Bellingham, M. E. Church Chelsea Mass., of which Rev. J. H. Packard is pastor. Mrs. Telford is assisting in the services, holding meetings for women only and aiding in the personal work among the seekers in the general meetings.

Dr. L. W. Munhall's labors at Grand Island, Neb., were much blessed. Some of those far Western towns are very difficult to move in religious and spiritual things, but at Grand Island God marvellously owned the labors of his servant. At Muskegon, Mich., where he is now holding services, nearly all the Evangelical Churches are combining in the movement. Twelve hundred young men, the majority of whom were unconcerned about salvation, were at the Opera House, at the Sunday service and over one hundred of them publicly gave testimony of conversion. While this service was in progress the first Baptist Church was filled with Christian ladies to pray for the conversion of sons and brothers. At the conclusion of these services, Dr. Munhall has promised to come East, where the churches of Cohoes, N. Y., Jersey City, N. J., and other places are hoping for a visit.

LEAP IN TO SAVE.

WHY hold a meeting just for the sake of holding it? What earthly use wasting time in a service of no account or help to any one?

Why take the time of busy workers in a gathering that yields no profit to any one there?

For the life of me I can't see.

If a service is for salvation, the unconverted must be gotten there, and if this can't be done, better send the Christian out where the lost are to be found, and discovering them leap in to their rescue. Says Dr. McArthur of New York:

"Years ago, in the city of Rochester, there lived a gentleman, in whose house I afterwards lived some time, and from whose lips I had an account of this incident. He had been to the city of New York and had come back to Rochester, and was walking up Mill Street. It was before the walls of the buildings had encroached upon the river, as they now do. He saw a crowd of people standing on the shore of the river, above the upper falls. He hastened to the spot, and upon inquiry, learned that a little boy had fallen into the stream, and had been carried down by the current until he had gone out of sight in an eddy. It took but a moment for him to drop his traveling-bag, pull off his coat, throw off his hat, and plunge into the water. He was out of sight a moment while the crowd watched with bated breath. A moment more and they saw the water gurgling and bubbling; a moment more and they saw him come up with the boy in his arms. Out went the hands to help; up went the shouts. But look at him! He wipes the water from his eyes and looks at the boy a moment; he lets the child fall, and he, himself, falls upon his knees and cries out, 'Oh, God! It is my own boy!' That boy is a man to-night and lives in the city of Brooklyn. His father only knew that somebody's boy was drowning, and leaping in to save somebody's boy, he saved his own. Is there not some poor, wayward boy whom you could save? Leap in to save him. He is your brother in the larger circle of life. But it may be your own brother, in the nearer relations of life, who is in danger.

How to Backslide.

I certainly would backslide religiously in a month if I did nothing but listen to two sermons a week and attend one, not over-hot, prayer meeting.

Some folks can live on a pint of rice a day but I doubt it for myself. So with feeding the soul, if one grows fat there must be plenty of good food.

Three meals a day for body and three meals a week for soul is a little out of proportion, and apt to give the world, the flesh, and the devil the biggest chance for victory.

Just listening to preachers and bowing the head while others pray will no more nourish the soul than watching a train speed by will carry one across the country.

It is safe to say the following rules will prove effective in producing backsliding nine times out of ten:

1. Careless praying.
2. Superficial listening to preaching.
3. Aimless reading of the Bible.
4. Too much amusement.
5. Absence of noble purposes.
6. Total absorption of the mind by business.
7. Yielding to selfishness.
8. A criticising spirit.
9. Lack of holy endeavor; and,
10. Loose views of Scripture Doctrines.

The road from Great Joy City to Miserable Hollow is smooth in spots and just ten miles long. Some one has set up mile posts over the entire route and the above are some of the markings found thereon.

FORTY COMING WONDERS.

A new and enlarged edition has been issued of Rev. M. Baxter's famous work on the unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible entitled Forty Coming Wonders. It contains 540 pages and fifty full-page illustrations of the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. In an appendix is a resume of the opinions of eminent expositors of prophecy, ancient and modern. Price (including postage), seventy-five cents. May be had of Rev. George A. Sparks, 92 Bible House, New York.

RECORD OF THE WEEK.

Death of U. S. Senator Plumb—Ravages of the Grip—France and Bulgaria at Odds—The Quebec Cabinet Crisis—A Terrible Christmas Eve Railroad Disaster.

U STARTLING illustration of the terrible consequences that sometimes follow a momentary neglect of duty is furnished by a fatal accident which took place near Hastings Station, on the New York Central Railroad, on Christmas Eve. A train from New York was delayed at Dobbs Ferry depot for some trivial cause. Coming up on the same track was the Niagara Falls fast special, consisting of two ordinary passenger coaches and two sleepers. This train was signalled to stop, and a trainman named Herrick was sent down the track to signal the fast St. Louis express, which was due half an hour later. It was a drizzly night and the trainman, it is charged, instead of stopping on the track in readiness with his signal lamps, deserted his post and entered the little station at Hastings to smoke a cigar. It is also alleged that he even visited a barroom, although the lives of probably a hundred persons depended upon his personal vigilance and fidelity. At all events, when the St. Louis express came thundering along behind time, and flying at the rate of fifty miles an hour, it crashed into the Niagara Falls special, like a cannon-ball, telescoping the sleeping-car Gibraltar and tearing, scalding and mangling its twenty-two occupants, most of whom were travelers speeding on to spend Christmas with friends. Eleven persons were killed outright and seven others seriously injured while still others were more or less hurt by shock, escaping steam or flying debris. The dead were taken to the morgue at Tarrytown. Herrick, the trainman whose criminal neglect caused the disaster, could not be found, and it was said that he had changed his clothing and run away to avoid arrest.

Chili to Make Amends.

It is a matter for national congratulation that the prospect of war with Chili, has been transformed during the past week into one of peace. Our State Department has received assurances that the Chilean government will make proper reparation for the assault upon the sailors of the Baltimore. Secretary Tracy has authorized a denial of the widely-circulated statement that any of our naval vessels have been ordered to Chilean waters in anticipation of war, or that the government has had in contemplation a conflict with Chili. Altogether the situation is peaceful and likely to remain so.

Death of U. S. Senator Plumb.

OVERWORK, which has caused the death of not a few distinguished men during the present generation, has scored another victim. United States Senator Plumb of Kansas, who had been noticeably failing for some time past, was stricken down with apoplexy at Washington a few days ago, and died within a few hours. He had been warned by physician and friends to take a needed rest, but persisted in attending to his duties, and the blow came while he was seated at his desk. Last summer he had a seizure that alarmed his family but he seemed to think little of it. Preston B. Plumb, whose portrait is here given, was born on a farm near Delaware, O., in 1837, and received a common school education. He learned the printer's trade but soon went to Kansas and after a brief farming experience, started a paper at Emporia. Soon the young editor became a recognized power in Southern Kansas. He studied law, was admitted but he seemed to think little of it. Preston B. Plumb, whose portrait is here given, was born on a farm near Delaware, O., in 1837, and received a common school education. He learned the printer's trade but soon went to Kansas and after a brief farming experience, started a paper at Emporia. Soon the young editor became a recognized power in Southern Kansas. He studied law, was admitted to the bar and took an active interest in politics. After a brief army career, he was elected to the State legislature and in 1876 was sent to the U. S. Senate by the Republicans. He was twice afterward re-elected as Senator, and served continuously till the time of his death. Mr. Plumb, with his tall figure and broad shoulders, was a striking figure in the Senate. As an orator he was forcible and effective, plain of speech, and invariably well informed on his subject. There were few harder workers in Congress. With the farmer element he was especially popular, although he did not hesitate at times to vigorously oppose their favorite schemes. He has shared in almost every great parliamentary debate during the last fifteen years, and has not hesitated to vote and act independently of his party. His aggressive style and wit frequently attracted much attention. Altogether he was one of the strongest individualities Congress has known in the present generation.

Quebec's Ministerial Crisis.

SOMETIME ago THE CHRISTIAN HERALD referred to the trouble in official circles in Quebec, consequent on the charges made against the EX-PREMIER MERCIER.

Mercier Ministry in connection with certain public works, and more particularly with regard to what is known as the Baie des Chaleurs affair. On the strength of a senate inquiry, Lieutenant-Governor Angers demanded an immediate explanation from the ministers of the charges of bribery and corruption, with the alternative of instant dismissal from office. This proceeding was declared unconstitutional and a Royal Commission was appointed to investigate. That commission reported in due time, and the result was Premier Mercier's dismissal. The report, Lieutenant-Governor Angers claimed, showed carelessness and illegalities on the part of Premier and Cabinet. M. Mercier, however, is determined to fight and has replied, declaring the report to be a partisan document. Meanwhile, M. de Boucherville has formed a new Cabinet. A very large portion of the people of Quebec sympathize with the ex-Premier and the dismissal is likely to be made political capital, as it has created widespread excitement in the Province. A portrait of M. Mercier is given above.

Renewed Trouble with Chili.

WITHIN the last week, a revulsion of feeling on the Baltimore affair seems to have taken place in Chili, for simultaneously with the news of the close of the official investigation at Valparaiso, comes the intelligence that threatening demonstrations have been made against the American Legation at Santiago. Cipher dispatches received by our State Department from Minister Egan represent the situation as serious. The Legation a few days ago was surrounded by police and a mob of citizens, the latter threatening to burn the building unless certain refugees, said to be hiding there, were delivered up. Instructions were sent to Minister Egan to report at once concerning the attitude of the local authorities and police, to enable this government to judge whether proper protection was being afforded by the Chilean government to the Legation. It is not improbable, should Minister Egan's further dispatches show a continuance of the hostile demonstrations, that an ultimatum may be sent to Chili; but up to the present time, no overt act has been committed.

Captives of the Mahdists.

News has reached Cairo of the Europeans who fell into the hands of the fanatical Mahdists in 1883, an Austrian missionary who was among the captives having managed to effect his escape. After the fall of Kordofan, at the height of the Mahdist war, forty Europeans were taken to Omdurman in chains by the dervish troops where they are still held closely guarded, and heavily manacled. They have lost all hope of ever being rescued. The dervishes, however, are losing their ascendancy and as the Soudan favors the restoration of control by the Egyptian government, it is not improbable that an effort may now be made to secure the liberation of the captives. Slatin Bey, a brave officer, who was also captured and believed to be dead, is still alive and has been attached to the bodyguard of the Mahdi's successor, but is closely watched to prevent his escape.

The Grip on its Travels.

WHILE one-half the European Continent is more or less affected by the influenza epidemic, the unwelcome visitor continues to spread in this country, although the type is much milder than when it last appeared here. Among many prominent persons who have been temporarily prostrated are Gov.-elect McKinley of Ohio, Congressman Mills, Walt Whitman the aged poet, and a number of others. All are now recovering. Thus far there have been very few fatal cases in the United States.

EMPEROR OF AUSTRIA. The ravages of the influenza have been specially severe in New Jersey, Massachusetts, Connecticut, West Virginia and New York. It has been almost epidemic in the Ohio Valley and there are many points in different states where whole families have been stricken. In Europe, Emperor Francis Joseph, of Austria, is so ill that his life is despaired of. The portrait of the Emperor is given above. King Oscar and Queen Sophia of Sweden, Princess Charlotte of Saxe-Meiningen and other royalties are also prostrated, showing that the grip is no respecter of rank or title. Prof. Nothnagel, court physician at Vienna, has traced the history of the disease back as far as the ninth century, and states that it recurs three or four years with varying intensity and then disappears for twenty years or more. He knows of no remedy, but distinctly warns sufferers against the use of anti-pyrene and anti-febrine and suggests digitalis, camphor and baths.

Aiding the Hebrew Immigrants.

SIXTY-EIGHT thousand dollars have already been subscribed in New York as the beginning of a fund for the purpose of aiding the steadily increasing numbers of Russian Hebrews who are arriving in this country. The money is to be used solely for transportation, the object being to relieve the Hebrew community in New York of the task of caring for these arrivals, whose numbers are overwhelming. Seven thousand five hundred per month, have arrived during the year. Several colonies recently established in New Jersey are highly prosperous, and it is understood that the experiments at colonization in other States have also been satisfactory.

The Franco-Bulgarian Trouble.

It now seems that the rupture of diplomatic relations between France and Bulgaria, consequent on the expulsion of the French journalist, PRINCE FERDINAND.

Chadouine, from Bulgarian territory as mentioned in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD last week, is but the initial step in a wary scheme to open the way for the Sultan to interpose his Suzerain authority in Bulgaria in the interest of Russia. France, apparently, has seized the Chadouine incident as the opportunity to bring about such a situation. France, never having recognized Prince Ferdinand, can now declare her intention to look to the Suzerain for redress. It is possible that the Sultan may decline to interfere. M. Cambon, the French Ambassador at Constantinople has demanded a conference with the Sultan on the subject. Failing to obtain satisfaction, it is not improbable that France may proceed to blockade Bulgarian ports or take some other step that would at once shatter the peace of Europe. The Russian press has taken up the affair and criticizes Bulgaria's conduct as insolent. It is possible that the quarrel may result in the removal of Prince Ferdinand from the Bulgarian throne. He was chosen as Prince by the Grand National Assembly in 1889 and accepted by the Sultan as a Suzerain ruler. He has never been thoroughly popular but he is ambitious and is supported by Premier Stambouloff, who is one of the most earnest workers for Bulgarian independence. Prince Ferdinand's portrait is given on this page.

The World's Fair and Sunday.

"SHALL the World's Fair be opened on Sundays?" is a question that is now being very widely agitated and discussed throughout the country. Petitions signed by many thousands of names, have been drawn up by religious organizations and these have been forwarded to Congress in the form of a memorial. Some of these petitions take the ground that only on condition that the Fair be closed on the Lord's Day should Congress grant the $5,000,000 loan asked by the World's Fair managers. Several memorials of this character were presented in the United States Senate last week.

Growth of Our Indian Schools.

ONE of the most interesting phases of our civilization is the growth and usefulness of the schools established for the benefit of the Indian children. Statistics just completed show that there are now 17,926 pupils in these schools, as against 4,006 in 1882. The government appropriation is $2,291,650 for the current year, as against $135,000 ten years ago. Commissioner Morgan estimates that to support all the Indian children of school-going age in the country in government schools, furnish the necessary new buildings and apparatus, superintendence, etc., would cost $3,102,500. Through the medium of these schools the red men are being fitted for better citizenship and it is safe to assert that the next generation will be an intelligent and law-abiding race.

NEWS NOTES.

New York business men are agitating for a State appropriation of $1,000,000 for the World's Fair.

President Frances E. Willard, of the National W. C. T. U., is seriously ill of the grip at Evanston, Ill.

The London Corporation proposes to give a wedding present of $12,500 to Prince Albert Victor and his bride.

Sixty persons were killed or wounded, during a fight between troops and a mob in the streets of Pernambuco, Brazil, lately. The Governor of the Province has resigned.

Mr. George W. Childs has presented to the library of the Drexel Institute, Philadelphia, his collection of rare prints, manuscripts, autographs and literary relics, valued at $100,000.

Emin Pasha is back in his old Equatorial province. He has a force of about 9,000 men, well armed with breech-loaders and muzzle-loading rifles. In view of recent rumors of a threatened attack upon him, he would seem to be able to hold his own.

The authorities of Victoria, B. C., have discovered in that city regular slave shambles, where Chinamen buy women as they would buy tea. These girls who are between 11 and 14 are disposed of at prices ranging from $700 to $1,400. The "highbinders" are the patrons and supporters of the nefarious traffic.

A Deep Waterways Convention was held last week at Detroit, at which representatives from the Boards of Trade in half a dozen states were present. The main subjects considered were the improvement of the channels of water communication through the lakes, deepening of harbors, constructing of lighthouses, etc.

A number of Southern negroes who went to Liberia some time ago as colonists, allured by the attractive reports of its fertility and the advantages offered to settlers, have returned sick, impoverished and disgusted. They declare the land open to settlement is practically worthless, and the climate unendurable to American negroes.

By the death of the Duke of Devonshire, in England, last week, the career of the Marquis of Hartington in the House of Commons is closed. He now succeeds his father as Duke of Devonshire and whatever political influence he wields in the future will be in the House of Lords. His removal will be a serious loss to his party in the House of Commons, where his powers in debate were generally recognized.

THE WITHERED HAND.

"And, behold, there was a man which had his hand withered. Then saith he to the man, Stretch forth thine hand. And he stretched it forth; and it was restored whole, like as the other."—Matthew 11:10, 13.

NOTE well the expression. Jesus "went into the synagogue; and, behold, there was a man which had his hand withered." A mark is set, as it were, in the margin, as if it were a notable fact. That word "behold" is a sort of note of exclamation to draw attention to it. "Behold, there was a man which had his hand withered." There were persons well learned, according to the learning of the day, who came to listen to Christ, but there are no "beholds" put about their having been present. Yet in the synagogue there was a poor man whose hand had been withered, and we are called upon to note the fact.

Patients Welcome.

And to-night, dear friends, it matters very little to the preacher or the congregation that you are here, if you are some person of note or consequence; for we make no note of dignitaries here, and attach no special consequence to any one in this place, where the rich and the poor meet together. But if you happen to be here as a needy soul wanting a Saviour, if you happen to be here with a spiritually withered hand so that you cannot do the things that you would, and you are wanting to have that hand restored to you, there shall be a "behold" put to that, and especially shall it be doubly emphatic if to-night the Master shall say to you, "Stretch out thy withered hand," and if the divine power shall restore that hand and a deed of grace shall be accomplished. If you are rich and increased in goods and have need of nothing, my Master does not want you. He is a physician, and those who practise the healing art look out for sickness as their sphere of operation.

The Crippled Man.

I. First, we will say a little about the person to whom the command in our text is addressed. "Then said Jesus to the man, stretch forth thine hand." This command was addressed to a man who was hopelessly incapable of obeying. "Stretch forth thine hand." It was not a sham disease. He had not made a pretence of being paralyzed, but he was really incapable. The hand had lost the moisture of life. The spirit which gave it strength had been dried out of it, and there it was a withered, wilted, useless thing, with which he could do nothing; and yet it was to such a man that Jesus said, "Stretch forth thine hand." This is very important for us to notice, because some of you under a burden of sin think that Christ does not save real sinners—that those people whom he does save are, in some respects, not quite so bad as you—that there is not such an intensity of sin about them as about your case, or if an intensity of sin, yet not such an utter hopelessness and helplessness as there is about you. You feel quite dried up, and utterly without strength. Dear hearer, it is exactly to such as you that the Lord Jesus Christ directs the command.

But, mark you, it came to one who was perfectly willing, for this man was quite prepared to do whatever Jesus bade him do. If you had questioned him you would have found no desire to retain that withered hand—no wish that his fingers should remain lifeless and useless. If you had said to him, "Poor man, would you like to have your hand restored?" he would have replied, "Ay, that I would. I wish above all things that I could have my hand restored!" But the worst of many unconverted people is that they do not want to be restored. As soon as a man truly longs for salvation, then has salvation already come to him; but the most of you do not wish to be saved. "Oh," say you, "we truly wish to be saved." I do not think so, for what do you mean by being saved? Do you mean being saved from going down to hell? Everybody, of course, wishes that. Did you ever meet a thief that would not like to be saved from going to prison or being locked up by the policeman? But when we talk about salvation, we mean being saved from the habit of wrong doing; being saved from the power of evil, the love of sin, the practice of folly, and the very power to find pleasure in transgression.

Do you wish to be saved from pleasurable and gainful sins? Find me the drunkard who sincerely prays to be delivered from drunkenness. Bring me an unchaste man who pines to be pure. Find me one who is an habitual liar and yet longs to speak the truth. Bring me one who has been selfish and who in his very heart hates himself for it, and longs to be full of love and to be made Christ-like. Why, half the battle is won.

The Initial Step is Taken.

The parallel holds in the spiritual world. The character I have in my mind's eye is the case of a soul desiring to be what it cannot be, and to do what it cannot do, and yet desiring it. I mean the man who cries in agony, "To will is present with me, but how to perform that which is good I find not." "I would, but cannot, repent. My heart feels like a stone. I would love Christ, but, alas, I feel that I am fettered to the world. I would be holy, but, alas, sin comes violently upon me, and carries me away." It is to such people that Jesus Christ's Gospel comes with a force of command. Wilt thou be made whole, my friend? Then thou mayest be. Dost thou desire to be saved from sin? Thou mayest be. Dost thou wish to be emancipated from the bondage of corruption? Thou mayest be. And this is the way in which thou mayest be saved—"Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved;" his name is called Jesus, for he shall save his people from their sins.

Who Spoke to Him.

II. Secondly I want to speak a little upon the person who gave the command. It was Jesus who gave it. He said, "Stretch forth thine hand." Did our Lord speak this in ignorance, supposing that the man could do so? By no means, for in him is abundant knowledge. He knew that the man's hand was withered, and yet he said, "Stretch forth thine hand." When I read in Scripture the command, "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ," I am sure that Jesus Christ knows what he is saying. "Go ye," said he, "into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature." Yes, to every creature. I have heard some of Christ's professed servants say that to bid dead sinners live is of no more use than to shake a handkerchief over the graves in which the dead are buried; and my reply to them has been,

"You are quite right. Do not do it, for it is evident you are not called to it. Go home and go to bed. The Lord never sent you to do anything of the kind, for you own you have no faith in it." But if my Master sent me as the herald of resurrection, and bade me shake a handkerchief over the graves of the dead, I would do it, and I should expect that this poor handkerchief, if he commanded it to be shaken, would raise the dead, for Jesus Christ knows what he is doing when he sends his servants. If he does not send us, it is a fool's errand indeed to go and say, "Ye dead men, live"; but his commission makes all the difference.

Did you never notice, dear souls,

Christ's Way of Doing His Work?

His way is this,—first, to give the command, then to help the heart to turn the command into a prayer, and then to answer that prayer by a promise. Take these specimens. The Lord says, "Make you a new heart." That is clearly a command. But by-and-by, you find the psalmist David, in the fifty-first psalm, saying, "Create in me a clean heart, O God." And then, if you turn to Ezekiel, you get the promise, "A new heart also will I give you." First, he commands you; next he sets you praying for the blessing; and then he gives it to you.

"But he is not here," says one, "he is not here." Verily I say unto you in his name, he is here. His word is, "Lo, I am with you alway, even to the end of the world;" till this dispensation shall be ended Christ will be where the Gospel is preached. Where his message is honestly and truthfully delivered with the Spirit of God, there Jesus Christ himself is virtually present, speaking through the lips of his servants. Therefore, dear soul with the withered hand, to-night Jesus says to thee, "Stretch forth thine hand."

III. It is time for a few words upon another point, and that is upon itself. The command itself was, "Stretch forth thine hand." That was the very thing he could not do, and thus the command went to the very root of the mischief. As soon as the hand was stretched out it was healed; and the command went directly to the desired mark. Now, my Lord and Master does not say to any of you sinners to-night, "Go home and pray." I hope you will pray, but that is not the great Gospel command. The Gospel is, "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." Paul stood at the dead of night, with the trembling jailer, who hardly understood his own question, when he cried, "Sirs, what must I do to be saved?" and Paul according to the practice of some should have said, "We must have a little prayer," or, "You must go home and read the Bible, and I must further instruct you until you are in a better state." He did nothing of the sort, but there and then Paul said, "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." There is no Gospel preached unless you come to this; for salvation comes by faith; by nothing short of it.

That stretching forth of the hand was entirely an act of faith. It was not an act of sense. As a matter of sense and nature the man was powerless for it. He only did it because his faith brought the ability. I say it was that stretching out of the hand. "I do not understand as yet," says one, "how a man can do what he cannot do?" But you will understand a great many other wonderful things when the Lord teaches you; for the Christian life is a series of paradoxes; and for my own part I doubt an experience unless there is something paradoxical about it. At any rate I am sure that it is so—that I who can do nothing of myself can do everything through Christ which strengtheneth me. The man who is seeking Christ can do nothing, and yet, if he believeth on Christ, he can do every thing, and his withered hand is stretched out.

I think I hear somebody say, "Oh, sir, you would not be praising me too much if you were to say that I do wish to be saved, and saved in Christ's own way; I would give my very eyes to love him." Ah, you need not lose your eyes: give him your trust; give him your soul's eyes. Look to him and live. "Oh, that I could be saved," says one; "How I long for it." May the Holy Ghost lead you to resolve in your own soul that you will not be saved by anybody but by Christ. When this is done, I do not doubt that, through faith in the Physician you will be quickened by divine power, and you will find healing at once.

IV. So I will just lead you on, in the fourth place, to notice

This Man's Obedience.

We are told that he stretched forth his hand. Christ said, "Stretch forth thine hand:" Mark says "And he did so." That is to say, he stretched forth his hand. Now, observe that this man did not do something else in preference to what Jesus commanded, though many awakened sinners are foolish enough to try experiments. Alas, there are many, many souls that say, "We are bidden to trust in Jesus, but instead of that we will attend the means of grace regularly." Do that by all means, but not as a substitute for faith, or it will become a vain confidence. The command is, "Believe and live"; attend to that, whatever else you do. "Well, I shall take to reading good books; perhaps I shall get good that way." Read the good books by all means, but that is not the gospel: the gospel is, "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved." "But you do not mean to say that you speak against praying, and reading good books, and so on?" Not one single word do I speak against any of those things. Let the man search the Scriptures; but, remember, that if these things are put in the place of simple faith in Christ, the soul will be ruined. Let me give you a text: did you ever hear it quoted properly? "Ye search the Scriptures, for in them ye think ye have eternal life; but ye will not come unto me that ye might have life." That is in Christ; not in searching Scripture, good as the searching of Scripture is. "Stretch forth thine hand," says he; that was the way by which the healing was to come: the man did nothing else, and he received a gracious reward.

Where the Life Is—

Notice, that he did not raise any questions. Now this man had a fair opportunity of raising questions. I think he might very fairly have stood up in his place and said, "This is inconsistent, good Master. Thou sayest to me, 'Stretch forth thine hand.' Now, thou knowest that if I can stretch forth my hand there ails me nothing, and therefore there is no room for thy miracle. And if I cannot stretch forth my hand, how canst thou tell me so to do?" Have you not heard some of our friends, who like to make jests of holy things, and to scoff at our doctrines of grace, declare that we teach, "You can and you can't; you shall and you shan't"? Their description is right enough, though meant to ridicule us. We do not object to their putting it thus, if it pleases them. We teach paradoxes and contradictions to the eye, if you only consider the letter; but if you get down into the innermost spirit, it is within these contradictions that the eternal truth is found. We know that the man is dead in trespasses and sins—steeped in a spiritual and moral torpor, out of which he cannot raise himself; yet do we by the Master's own command say, "Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee life;" or in other words, we say to the withered hand, "Be thou stretched out," and it is done. The blessed result justifies that very teaching which in itself seems so worthy of sarcastic remark.

I look around me, wondering where is the man with the withered hand to-night, or where is the woman with the withered hand. To such I would say in my Master's name, "Stretch out that hand of thine." It is

An Auspicious Moment

A great thing shall surely be done unto thee. Believe thou now. Thou hast said aforetime, "I never can believe." Now trust Jesus. Sink or swim, trust him.

Our Lord Jesus never casts away a sinner who trusts in him. Though you be the most unworthy wretch that ever trusted him, trust him now, that it may be told in heaven that there is a bigger sinner saved to-day than ever was saved before. Such a salvation will make Christ more glorious than he ever was; and if yours is a worse case than he ever touched with his healing hand to this day, well then, when he has touched and healed you, as he will, there will be more praise to him in heaven than he ever had before. O soul, I would I could persuade thee to draw nigh to him, but my Master can do it.

V. The last thing to consider is of this stretching out of the man's hand in obedience to the command. He was healed. I have already tried to set before you the fact that the healing was manifest; it was also immediate. The man had not to stand there a long time but his hand was straightway healed; and yet the cure was perfect, for his hand was whole like unto the other, just as useful as his left hand had been, with all the extra dexterity which naturally belongs to the right. It was perfectly healed, though healed in a moment. You may depend upon it, that it was permanently healed; for, though I have heard it said that saved souls fall from grace and perish, I never believed it, for I have never read of any of the cases which our Lord cured that they became bad again. My Master's cures last forever. I remember seeing in the shop windows some years ago, that there was to be had within a "momentary cure" for the toothache. I noticed after a few months that the proprietor of that valuable medicine, whatever it was, had discovered that nobody wanted and so the word "momentary" was changed for the word "instantaneous," which was a great improvement. I am afraid that some people's salvation is a momentary salvation. They get a sort of grace, and they lose it again. They get peace, and by-and-by it is gone. What is wanted is permanence, and there is always permanence in the work of Christ.

A Momentary Cure,

O soul, dost thou see, then, what is to be had at this moment of Jesus? Healing for life; deliverance from the withering power of sin through life and through eternity. This is to be had by cheerful obedience to the matchless command: "Stretch forth thine hand," or in other words, "Trust, trust, trust." There can be no difficulty in that; to trust and rest upon one whom you cannot doubt must follow as a matter of course upon your good opinion of him. Your belief that he is true is a sort of faith. Throw yourself upon him now. If thou doest this thou shalt be saved. And I do not mean merely that you shall be saved from hell; for the power of faith, working in you by God the Holy Spirit, shall save you from loving sin any more: being forgiven, and you will henceforth love him who forgives you, and you will receive a new principle of action which shall be strong enough to break the bands of your old habits, and you shall rise into a pure and holy life. If the Son shall make you free, you shall be free indeed; and free you shall be at once if you trust him. The Lord grant his blessing, for Christ's sake. Amen.

THE WEAVERS.

GOD works for us with ceaseless skill,
As through the world we go,
That His image, in us imperfect,
More beautiful may grow.

With Him—unthinkingly—we weave
A pattern, strange and rare:
'Tis Character, and must be wrought,
With utmost skill and care.

A two-fold web we weaver's have;
God's half is smooth and plain,
To us belong those tangled threads
That run against the grain.

'Tis odd, this pattern that we weave!
Here interspersed with gloom,
And there, perhaps, a radiance rare
Is caught within the loom.

With laughter and with singing
Is the treadle sometimes run;
Or, again, it is with weeping,
And the wish that life were done.

Oh weave, then, well and wisely;
Though our work we may not see
Until "Life's Tapestry" is shown
To all Eternity. —D. N. E.

THE YEARLY DIARY.

BEFORE us lies an open book,
Its pages white and fair;
The coming year shall soon decide
The record it shall bear.
Not written o'er with human hands,
Nor seen by mortal sight,
That book shall hold our every deed
Borne upward day and night.

Here on the threshold of the year,
Let us review the past,
And strive to make each coming month
Far nobler than the last.
Thou who art in the morn of life,
With prospects bright and fair,
And thou so near the eventide,
Think of the record there.

Departing year, fast fleeting year,
A lesson I would learn,
That moments wasted and miss-spent
Will nevermore return.
Though life may seem a passing show,
Or but an idle tale,
We'll learn its true solemnity
When passed beyond the veil.

A MEDICAL MISSIONARY.

been its light and strength. Now that she was gone it seemed no longer like home. The boy lost his interest in it, grew discontented and restless, and finally, after drifting around for a few months, he entered the navy as a common sailor. It was a new experience to him, for he had scarcely seen a ship before. More than once he narrowly escaped death through his inexperience. Descending the rigging with hands numbed with cold, he missed his grip and was near falling into the sea. At another time one of the huge guns was unshipped during a storm and the new recruit was within a few inches of the spot where it crashed into the ship's side. But he was mercifully preserved and for two and a half years performed his duties with increasing knowledge and ability. At the end of that time his rudimentary knowledge of medicine was discovered by the officers, and he was promoted to the position of sick-berth steward, a position equivalent to that of hospital sergeant in the army.

During this period of service the young sailor had drifted far away from his pious mother's teachings. He was the companion of the rough, drinking, profane sailors and had learned their evil habits. One day—it was a Sunday—he and a party of sailors went ashore at a little town called Queenboro to spend the afternoon in jollity. As they walked through the town they heard the sound of singing. It came from children singing in a Sunday School. That hymn sung by the childish voices not only spoiled young Dowkontt's pleasure for the afternoon, but became the starting point of a new life. It was a hymn he knew well—one his mother used to sing, "When I can read my title clear," and its words carried his memory back to the time when he was not a careless, godless sailor, but a praying boy with a godly mother. There was no fun for him that day and when his companions rallied him on his doleful face and manner, he bluntly declared that he had lived his present life long enough and with God's help was going to turn over a new leaf. They ridiculed his resolution and predicted that it would soon be broken. But it was not. He went back to the ship to pray and he did not rest until he had been led to Jesus for salvation.

With the change in his own heart came the desire to do good and he had no need to leave the ship to find an opportunity. Indeed his position in the ship's hospital gave him access to the men when they were in a receptive mood, and the young Christian made good use of it. He was the only Christian on the ship, and was ridiculed and jeered at continually but when the men were under his care, sick, they would listen willingly as he read the Bible to them and prayed with them. He also obtained from a Society in London suitable tracts at a cheap rate, which he distributed. Some very remarkable conversions resulted from these efforts and though there was still an occasional joke among the men at his expense he was cordially liked and respected.

On some of his voyages sick men from the other ships of the navy were sent on board for treatment, and when they returned, talked of the good fellow who had attended them. Dowkontt's name began to be talked of, and Admiral Sir William King Hall, a fine old Christian officer, heard of him and took an interest in him. To his surprise he was promoted to the Surgery of the Royal Dockyard at Portsmouth, where his opportunities of usefulness were enormously extended. He did much good work there, notably in organizing the Royal Navy Temperance Society in which he was cordially aided by several influential friends of the sailors. Routine duties, however, necessarily occupied much of his time while he was under the orders of the naval officers, and he longed to be giving all of his time to God's service. He finally decided to quit the navy and trust his future entirely to the Lord. His decision was received with profound regret and a farewell meeting was arranged by representatives of the service to present him with a testimonial, to thank him for all that he had done and bid him god-speed.

After a brief period of labor with a Mission in Liverpool, Dr. Dowkontt yielded to a long cherished desire to come to this country, there being a manifest leading of God's providence at that time. His first halting place was at Philadelphia. There he spent an arduous time. Not only did he carry on extensive mission work in the city, but took a college course. Hitherto his medical skill had been such as could be obtained by practice in the hospital and by home study of such books to as were accessible. Now he proposed to commence its study from the theoretical side under the guidance of acknowledged masters in the science. He entered himself at Jefferson Medical College and studied hard. At the end of his course he had the satisfaction of receiving his diploma as Doctor of Medicine with the emphatic commendation of the Dean of the Faculty. Shortly afterward he came to New York to begin the great enterprise of his life.

Many times during his sojourn at Philadelphia, he was in sore straits. Though all his time apart from his college studies was fully occupied, it was not in remunerative labor. He spent it in the missions and among the homes of the poor. More than once the last morsel of food in the house had been consumed, but prayer was made to God and always before the next meal-time came around, help arrived, and often from unexpected quarters. On one occasion the promise was fulfilled, "Before they call I will answer," the dry bread and coffee which were the sole contents of the larder had just been consumed at breakfast and Dr. Dowkontt was setting out for his work, having committed his burden as to dinner to the Lord, when the letter-carrier handed him a letter containing fifty dollars. It came from England and had left there twelve days previously. In New York similar experiences awaited him. The first free dispensary was opened in Chatham Square and in a few days there was a daily average of fifty patients. Sometimes among them would be one who would offer a grateful contribution of a quarter or half a dollar to the funds of the mission, but these were few and there were rent, gas, and other expenses to be met. How the bills were paid is a marvel, but Dr. Dowkontt's faith did not waver and money always came when it was needed. Many columns might be filled with instances of divine interposition. Sometimes the gifts have been as large as a hundred dollars at a time; but the remarkable feature has been that they have always been proportioned to the need. We are glad to learn that Dr. Dowkontt has been induced to prepare a statement of a number of these incidents with a history of the Mission, which will shortly be published in book form.

From the beginning of the work among the poor of New York, Dr. Dowkontt combined with it the other work by which he is best known outside the city—that of training medical missionaries for work in heathen lands. His first pupil was Dr. Summers whose portrait, with the story of his noble life and death in Africa, was printed in this journal on Nov. 29, 1888. He acted as general assistant to Dr. Dowkontt at his Dispensary while pursuing his medical studies, had the use of Dr. Dowkontt's library and the benefit of his advice and teaching with free board until he passed his examination and went to the scene of his labors. Another and another followed the same course, until fully qualified for medical labor in the foreign mission field. Forty of these have gone out to all lands and are doing noble work there, and fifty-two were in training during the past year.

The work of educating and supporting them during their studies has been carried on, as it began, by faith in God alone. To him Dr. Dowkontt has looked for funds and the Faithful Promiser has inclined his people to give the money as it has been needed. Besides the care of this large number of future missionaries Dr. Dowkontt has now nine mission dispensaries in various parts of this city and Brooklyn, all of which are being blessed to the souls and bodies of multitudes.

Single-handed the Doctor could never have accomplished so much. He has been aided financially by many Christian men and women who have now been organized into a Society under the name of the International Medical Missionary Society, its object being to continue and extend this grand work. It is not only international but inter-denominational. The members, like the students, belong to many denominations, as all Christians can unite in a work consisting of preaching Christ and healing the sick. Dr. Dowkontt is at the head of it and he hopes by its aid to realize his long cherished hope of establishing a college and hospital in which the medical missionaries whom he is now helping to train may prosecute their studies in suitable quarters and with more advantages. Compared with the sums now lavished on personal gratification by wealthy people, the sum needed to establish such an institution would not be large. Small sums are reaching the Doctor occasionally toward this object, from Christian people who know of his aim, and these are carefully set apart for the building fund. For the sake of the poor of New York, of the heathen abroad, and the devoted young men and women who are anxious to serve Christ by ministering to the sick and needy, we heartily hope that the Doctor's project will be realized.

HOW TO OBTAIN PEACE.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Commencing Jan. 10, 1892
Isa 26: 3; John 14: 27.

IT is the problem of more lives than we know of—this of how to obtain peace. Every man at some period of his career has been brought to regard it as the supreme object to be sought. He discovers early in his life that there is anarchy within him. He finds that he is drawn hither and thither by his appetites, his passions, his ambitions. He is conscious of wasted forces, of rival powers struggling with each other and keeping his own spiritual kingdom in a turmoil. By and by he makes the discovery that like the fabled centaur he is half man and half beast. He begins to realize that, if he is to become what God intended him to be, if he is to accomplish anything in his life for himself and others, the higher nature must rule the lower. Then there is a fierce struggle. The brute force of the lower nature will not be curbed and controlled. It is not anarchy now within him, but the suppression of rebellion, and with many it is a life-long struggle.

Then there are disturbances from without. The struggle for a livelihood brings worries, anxieties, apprehensions. The soul is agitated, the mind restless. Disappointment, vexation, chagrin rend the spirit and produce distraction. The conduct of friends or enemies brings discomposure. Troubles come; bereavements fall like lightning bolts; domestic and social and religious problems bring perplexity, and there seems neither rest nor quiet nor composure possible to the man.

How delightful in such turmoil is the assurance of one who must have had that experience: "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee; because he trusteth in thee." There is sound philosophy as well as comfort in such an assurance. The man who is troubled by symptoms in his own health and who has taken his case to a skilful physician; the man who has puzzled over intricate legal documents and has at length confided his case to an able lawyer—knows something of the peace that comes to a man who trusts in God. Given omniscience, omnipotence and love what a foundation there is for trust! It is not surprising that the man whose mind is stayed on God is kept in perfect peace.

It is the precious legacy of Christ to his people: My peace I give unto you. As we read the story of that wonderful life we get glimpses of what his peace was. Poor, despised, hated, maligned, beset by enemies, arraigned on a false charge, executed; the peace he had through it all must have been a peace almost inconceivable in its profundity. It is that peace—his own peace—that he imparts. And it was no vain promise. Men who have had it have borne the loss of property and have not lost that peace. Martyrs have carried it with them through the flames. Missionaries have had it with them in the face of ferocious heathen cannibals, in sickness, in loneliness, in perils of all kinds, and have been able to say as the first missionary said, "None of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto me." They who long for peace may find it in him. Thousands have gone to him and obtained it. That is the peace that the world cannot give, neither can it take away.

A SCOUT COMMITTEE.

A SUGGESTIVE letter as to the functions of a new committee which may do useful service in Christian Endeavor Societies is sent by F. M. Schuyler to the Golden Rule. The suggestion was, it appears, originally made at the Convention at Williamsport, Pa., but there is no copyright on it, so it may be set at work wherever there is opportunity for its operation. The following are the duties it may usefully undertake but which, it may incidentally be remarked will have to be performed with tact and kindly feeling in order to avoid friction:

1. To count and report to the lookout committee the average attendance of the members of the society, at the preaching service and the after-meeting on Sunday evenings, and to keep account of all that participate in these meetings.

2. To be on the alert for any new ideas that may be utilized.

3. To watch for young people not interested in any society or church, and report them to the lookout committee.

4. To study the work of every committee, and ascertain where they can give aid.

5. To bring in reports of anything, everything, and all things, good, bad, and indifferent, that affect the welfare of the society.

6. To take the word "scout," and study its definitions; not only "to observe the movements of the enemy," but to be vigilant, brisk, indefatigable in their oversight, that "all things be done decently and in order."

A THRIVING SOUTHERN ASSOCIATION.

ONE of the most progressive and prosperous Young Men's Christian Associations of the South is that of Atlanta, Ga. It was established in 1857 and is now in possession of a building, which with its site, is valued at $150,000. The accompanying picture is from a photograph of it which was kindly furnished to us by Mr. J. Edgar Eubanks of Atlanta. The Association came into possession of the site, which is only two blocks from the very centre of the city, some six years ago. The managers prudently decided to proceed with the building by degrees, as the finances warranted. The basement and first and second floors were finished and occupied in 1886. Since that time efforts have been made to raise a further sum for building purposes. Within a few months, thanks to the liberality of the citizens of Atlanta and the friends of the Association, the building fund has mounted up to $10,000 and the managers have promptly added a third and fourth story to the edifice.

NEW Y. M. C. A. BUILDING, ATLANTA, GA.

The interior arrangements have been made on an excellent plan. The gymnasium and auditorium are each two stories high and in each case a gallery surrounds the room, to which access is gained from the floor above that on which is the entrance to the floor of the room. In the basement besides the gymnasium are the engine rooms, baths and dressing rooms, with several store rooms which are rented out. On the floor above are the secretary's office, reception-parlor, a lecture-room and reading-room. On the third floor, besides the large auditorium, are class rooms and correspondence rooms. The fourth floor has the upper part of the auditorium giving access to the gallery and there are also more class rooms and offices. A broad, winding stair-case connects the various floors. The building has all the modern improvements, including elevator, steam-heat and hot and cold water and is lighted by electricity.

The Association is worthy of its beautiful home. It has 750 members and is in a most flourishing condition, spiritually and financially. The excellent secretary, Mr. C. A. Licklider, and the enterprising Board of Directors have given much thought and personal labor to the development of the Association, and it is largely due to their efforts, enthusiastically supported as they have been by the members, that the Association is so well equipped.

A CHURCH'S ENDORSEMENT.

THAT Christian Endeavor is heartily appreciated by the Church of the Disciples is evident by the following series of resolutions unanimously passed at its recent National Convention:

I. We hail with unfeigned delight and hearty approval the introduction and multiplication of Young People's Societies of Christian Endeavor in our churches, believing them wisely designed to develop the Christian life and to increase the efficiency of our young people in every department of service to Christ.

II. We desire to note and to emphasize especially that cardinal principle of Christian Endeavor which makes each local society amenable exclusively to the local church in which it is organized, and which makes the lines of enterprise in which the churches are engaged the lines along which the societies normally direct their endeavors in Christian work.

III. In order to aid in the organization of these societies, and to bring them into more intimate co-operation with all our general enterprises we recommend: That a general superintendent be appointed to gather Christian Endeavor statistics, to aid in the organization of Christian Endeavor societies by the distribution of Christian Endeavor literature, and to co-operate with the secretaries of our different boards in enlisting our young people in the missionary, educational and benevolent enterprises of our brotherhood, said general superintendent to receive no salary, but to be reimbursed for actual and necessary expenses of his office.

AN ENTHUSIASTIC CONVENTION.

ONE of our subscribers in Minnesota has been kind enough to send us a notice of a Christian Endeavor Convention in that State which he has been attending. It is gratifying to learn from his account that, as elsewhere, the movement is making excellent progress there, is appreciated by pastors and churches and is doing valuable work. This Convention was held at Edgerton and was the fifth semi-annual convention of the Luverne District. The subjects discussed were: "Bible Study," introduced by Mr. George Browning; "Our Relations to Our Own Church," by Mr. C. W. Hansen; "Amusements," by Mr. F. H. Day. Revs. Davis and Carter were present and made able addresses on the various subjects. The most prominent characteristic of the convention, however, which impressed every one, was the enthusiasm of the rank and file of the delegates. Every one seemed to be in earnest and happy in the work. It was evinced markedly in the singing. It came right from the heart, and when on the Sunday evening the whole convention joined in the chorus, "Throw out the Life-line," the scene and the sound of the voices will never be forgotten by any who were present.

A CIRCLE IN INDIA.

VERY gratifying is the report of the work the King's Daughters are doing in India. The President of one circle, which meets in Bangalore, sends a very charming account to the Silver Cross. It appears from this report that the Order in that far-away land is following the same lines as the Order at home and with equally cheering results. It is entirely undenominational and the young ladies find that the legitimate work of the Order is performed as efficiently by members of one denomination as by those of another. In the heart where there is love and loyalty to the King there is also a longing for service and no sect has a monopoly of such hearts. The Bangalore circle is made up of members of many churches, but they have found objects of common interest. They have been making children's garments for distribution to poor children at Christmas; they wholly clothe one poor girl of eleven years old whom they took out of miserable surroundings and placed at school at their own expense. They have now funds enough to put another little girl to school, and are preparing her outfit. Another beautiful, Christlike work has now attracted their attention and is to have a share of the circle's benefactions next year. This is the Children's Home, founded by Miss Anstey, in which there are now twenty-five little girls who were readily given up to Miss Anstey's care by their parents, and who, had Miss Anstey not accepted the charge, would have been devoted to the evil life which is followed by so many of the daughters of the poorer natives.

WITHOUT THE CHILDREN.

O THE weary, solemn silence
Of a house without the children!
O, the strange oppressive stillness
Where the children come no more!
Ah! the longing of the sleepless
For the soft arms of the children;
Ah! the longing of the faces
Peeping through the open door—
Faces gone for evermore!

What is home without the children?
'Tis the earth without its verdure,
And the sky without its sunshine—
Life is withered to the core!
So we'll leave this dreary desert,
And we'll follow the Good Shepherd
To the greener pastures vernal,
Where the lambs have "gone before,"
With the Shepherd evermore!

UNCLE JOHN'S TALKS.

He Tells about the Beautiful Flowers and Strange Creatures at the Bottom of the Sea.

HERE was an odd twinkle in Uncle John's gray eyes, as he dropped into his accustomed chair, the other evening, and called the children around him. Experience had taught them to expect a surprise in store, whenever the traveller took the initiative in the conversation, and to-night they were not mistaken.

"Let's see," he began, after he had made a rocker of his foot for little Milly, "we've been pretty much around the earth haven't we? What do you say to going to the bottom of the sea, to-night for a change, eh?"

"The bottom of the sea!" they exclaimed in chorus.

"Yes, right plumb down to the dusky hills and valleys and rocky retreats where the starfishes and the sea-horses dwell, and see what they are all doing."

"Oh, wouldn't it be nice!" cried Ted, clapping his hands. "But how are we to go? In a diving bell?"

"I guess not," said Uncle, smiling. "There isn't a diving bell built yet that could take us all down comfortably together, so we'll have to do without one. You know there are places where the sea is miles and miles in depth."

"Oh, yes," interrupted Tom. "I read the other day that off the coast of Japan, near that big mountain that was split by the earthquake, the sea is deeper than at any place yet discovered."

"The mean sea depth, Tom, is seldom less than fifteen times as great as the mean height of the land. There are many places where the depth is three miles and over. The deepest point known in the Atlantic (which is eight thousand miles long) is off St. Thomas, where a depression of about four miles has been found. Then there are places where vast shallows exist, showing that the sea, like the land, is broken up by mountain and valley. Changes resulting from earthquakes or other causes have altered the land surface greatly, even within historical times. Then, there are legends of populous cities—one off the African coast, another on the shores of Holland, and still another on the rocky coast of Wales—that have been swallowed up by the devouring waves. You have read of that tradition concerning the 'Lost Atlantis,' some of you? For the benefit of the others, I will explain it. Plato, the famous writer and philosopher, mentions in one of his books that there was once a great continent, known as Atlantis or Atlantica, peopled by a fierce race who were constantly at war with the nations dwelling on the northern and southern shores of the Mediterranean. A great earthquake occurred and in a single night, the continent and its cities, warriors and entire people vanished—swallowed up by the ocean! It was said that the traditionary record of this tremendous event was kept by the Egyptian priests at Sais; but in the absence of accurate history, doubt has been cast upon the story."

"Can anything live at the sea's bottom, Uncle?"

"Probably not in the lowest depths; below one hundred fathoms life diminishes, although both animal and vegetable life have been discovered at very deep points, by scientific dredging parties, in the South Atlantic. The lowest bottoms contain shells of unknown thickness and great fossils of monsters belonging to ages long since passed away. Few persons have an adequate idea of the grandeur and variety of the animal and vegetable life hidden by the sea; forests of tall, waving weeds, green, red, opaline, bluish and shaded in every imaginable tint; millions of insect-built palaces of coral, opulent in color and exquisite in design; vast parterres of richly-hued sea-flowers, strangely unlike an earth-garden. And these fairy-like gardens and grottoes of the sea are peopled by myriads of living creatures, from the tiniest speck that floats invisible save under the microscope, to the giant cetaceans, like the fabled kraken of the Scandinavian fisherman, which covered acres of ocean."

"What a monster!" cried the children.

"Look now at this photograph of a portion of the sea-bottom," said Uncle John, displaying a picture to the interested group. "This is taken from a bottom that is rough with coral. In his book on The Wire and the Wave, Mr. J. Munro, an authority on electrical literature, describes the operation of repairing a submarine cable near the equator. The cable which had been submerged several years was found covered with marine vegetation and live parasites, the dense colonies of barnacles making it appear as though plated with armor. This is how he describes it:

"It supported a thick sward of coral-lines, now in slender and translucent plumes or smoky sprays like fir, again a tangled tress of scarlet seaweed or tufts of amethystine moss. Yellow and purple sea-fans waved here and there along the pitchy rope, and curious arborescent growths, branched, horny, and crinkled, of various colors, brown, orange, mauve, or scarlet, were to be seen. Elegant crinoids or 'stone lilies' clung to the line at intervals by their tap-roots, as a bird claws to its perch, and reared their cups on delicately-jointed stalks resembling the marestalk, but white as porcelain. Through the meshes of this ocean garland, this wilderness of grass and flowers, suddenly lifted into another element, crept numbers of red crabs, each with a private grove of seaweed on his carapace. Occasionally a beautiful hyaline crab, clear as glass, and stained with different hues, like those of its habitat, might be observed; while horrid star fishes with gorgon heads of a hundred ever-crawling tentacles, some the color of the bare earth, others long and hairy like the legs of a tarantula, were very numerous."

"What causes sea cables to break?" was asked.

"Well, Mr. Munro writes that the cable shown in the picture was probably broken by the bite of some voracious fish, as the fragment of a powerful tooth was found sticking in the core. Turtles sometimes dig their beaks into ocean cables, he explains, and occasionally a whale while rubbing his parasite-coated skin on the wire, gets entangled and dies. Submarine earthquakes and volcanoes, too, occasionally cause breaks and once a small schooner was found entangled in a cable in the North Sea. But friction against rocks and the ravages of boring insects are the most frequent causes of cable breaks."

"Can the bottom of the sea be explored, Uncle?" Tom inquired.

"In places it has been to a slight extent by dredging and divers. But it is still almost as much a realm of mystery to us as it was in the days of Job, when the Lord asked him: 'Hast thou entered into the springs of the Sea? or hast thou walked in search of the depth?' It is among those things that are beyond the reach of man in his present condition, and shows us how little we really know of the world we live in and the wondrous handiwork of God by which we are surrounded."

Family Piety.

HOME is sweetened and daily life brightened by the influence of a daily Gospel portion. If it does not influence the home—the fountain-head of society—it cannot be expected to have an effect on the community. "God has made

A GLIMPSE OF THE OCEAN'S BOTTOM.*
(From "The Wire and the Wave" by J. Munro.)

family piety to be, as it were, a sort of trademark on religion," observes Pastor Spurgeon, "for the very first convert (Lydia) brings with her all her family. Her household believed, and were baptized with her. You shall notice in Europe, though I do not mean to say that it is not the same anywhere else, that true godliness has always flourished in proportion as family religion has been observed. They hang a bell in a steeple, and they tell us that it is our duty to go every morning and every evening into the steeple house, there to join in prayer; but we reply that our own house is better for many reasons; at any rate it will not engender superstition for us to pray there. Gather your children together, and offer prayer and supplication: to God in your own room. Every man should be a priest in his own household; and, in the absence of a godly father, the mother should lead the devotions. Every house should be the house of God, and there should be a church in every house; and when this is the case, it will be the greatest barrier against priestcraft and the idolatry of holy places. Family prayer and the pulpit are the bulwarks of Protestantism. Depend upon it, when family piety goes down, the life of godliness will become very low."

ADMIRAL PENN'S ADVICE TO HIS SON

ONE of the secrets of the greatness of William Penn, the founder of the State of Pennsylvania, was undoubtedly the fact that, as a youth, he gave strict heed to the excellent moral training he received. On his death bed, Admiral Penn, William's father, called the lad to his side and said to him:

"Son William, I am weary of the world. I would not live over my days again if I could command it with a wish, for the snares of life appear greater than the fear of death. It troubles me that I have offended a gracious God. The thought of that has followed me to this day. Oh! have a care of sin!—It is that which is the sting both of life and death. Three things I commend to you. First. Let nothing in this world tempt you to wrong your conscience; so you will keep peace at home, which will be a feast to you in the day of trouble. Secondly. Whatever you design to do, lay it justly and time it reasonably. Lastly. Be not troubled at disappointments, for if they may be recovered do it, if they cannot, trouble is vain. If you could not help it, be content; there is often peace and profit in submitting to Providence, for afflictions make wise. If you could have helped it, let not your trouble exceed instruction for another time. Shun all manner of evil, and I pray God to bless you all, and he will bless you."

Golden rules for a young man, and as applicable to-day as when they were uttered many generations ago.

Be Forgiving.

This is the season of forgiveness—a season when all brooding and revengeful thoughts should be banished from the heart.

"No good," says a writer in The Moravian "comes from encouraging this process of inner meditation, so near of kin to melancholy. When predisposed to yield to it, let us seek to get out of ourselves, and remembering that God still lives and rules, and that good is more mighty than evil, and love more powerful than hate, seek to look upon the bright side of life. Sound advice is that given by the eminently correct, even if somewhat proverbially prosaic poet:

Brood not on insults and injuries old,
For thou art injurious, too;
Count not their sum till the total is told,
For thou art unkind and untrue;
And if all thy harms are forgotten, forgiven,
Now mercy with justice is met,
Oh, who would not gladly take lessons of heaven,
Or learn to forgive and forget?

Musical Daughters.

WHY is it that our musical daughters use their talent so sparingly at home? They delight to play almost anywhere else, but it either requires too great an effort to do so for the pleasure of ones own household or she is "too tired." Writing on the subject in The Golden Rule Margaret Sidney says:

"I have made a sort of study of some girl musicians; and I will tell you what I saw in some instances. No matter how much money had been taken from the family purse, wisely or unwisely to educate the girl; no matter that the father and mother, have been obliged to forego society while the children were little, now had lost either the love for it, or the power to adapt themselves to it, and were therefore thrown back upon home resources for enjoyment; no matter that there were younger children to be pleased and in their turn influenced by music—I was astonished and grieved to find that these elder sisters never thought of such a thing as giving out their best music to the home circle. They would practice any amount, bravely and long, for a musicale at a friend's house, or for charity, but as for playing at home on the evenings when only the family were drawn up around them, the idea never occurred to them. I know many and so doubtless do you, who are unselfish and sweet, and untiring in their efforts to make the home people have a good time. And they succeed, too, admirably. But there are others; and, alas! many, too, who do not know how good a time they might have in cultivating their own family circle; and more's the pity of it, for their lives would be so much the richer!"

The trivial round, the common task,
Would furnish all we ought to ask:
Room to deny ourself, a road
To bring us daily nearer God

CHAPTER VI. (Continued.)

AND this, too, was the question that was asked at the gate of Canopus. But they reflected that, according to the prophets, Christ must have a forerunner of this Elijah-like character; and so they were prepared to hear, as they soon did, that the reformer's name was John the son of Zacharias, and that he distinctly told the people that he was not the Christ, only his forerunner. Then came rumors of Another; at first low-voiced and vague, then more distinct and emphatic—that John had introduced him to the people as the Greater One for whom he had been preparing the way; then that John himself had been slain by Herod; then that the new prophet whose name was Jesus was drawing the multitudes after him by a sublime teaching and a course of miracles such as had not been seen since the days of Moses, if ever. Of course the Alexandrian friends then felt sure that they had recovered the long-lost Child. The king of whom they had heard from the Chaldean sages, whose star had conducted that most memorable of all pilgrimages, and whose sublime childhood they had been permitted to look in upon, as by a window into heaven, was now being manifested to the nation at large. And though he had not come in the way the nation at large was expecting—was appearing as a king of wisdom and mercies, instead of as a king of battles and conquests—they felt sure that at last the Messiah had come to his own; and that, beyond all doubt, Jesus was he. In the joy of this great conviction the father died.

Such, in substance, though not in words, was the narrative of the Jew. As he proceeded in it he gradually came to speak with profound emotion. He ended with a voice that trembled and eyes that wept. Cimon was hardly less moved. They sat for a few moments in silence. Then Cimon said:

"This has been the fairest of mornings to me. Though a Greek by birth, I am a Hebrew in faith and expectations; and never did David so long for the waters of Bethlehem as I have longed for news of that Son of David and of Bethlehem, your Messiah. I say your Messiah; but I have reason to think that he is mine also; even to think that he belongs to all nations. Sometimes, perhaps, when my young friend is with me, I will explain further. But I may now say that, from what you have just told me, and from what I knew before, I am satisfied that the Christ has at last come and that Jesus is he. God be praised! Some difficulties still remain, and perhaps will always remain. Hard questions, questions that I cannot answer, stare at me out of the night. And yet, God be praised! The King has at last come."

The Jew grasped the hand of the Greek and murmured, "Brother!"

"Let me tell you another thing," the Jew added, after a moment. "I have seen him. Yes, I have seen Jesus and recognized in the full-grown man the unutterable something that spoke so powerfully to us in the child."

"When and where?" demanded the other.

"Not in dreams, though I scarcely dream of anything else, but with these bodily eyes. You see that, as news of the wonderful doings in Judea thickened upon us, I became too restless to remain quietly here while the world was being shaken only a few days' journey away. My brother, who long before the death of our father had taken this khan, felt very much as I did; and so we agreed to go together and see for ourselves, instead of having the facts filtered to us through the imaginations and prejudices, it may be, of other people. Accordingly we went; and not only recognized him as I have said, but were at once recognized by him and called by our names. None of our acquaintances were about him, we knew not a soul in Capernaum, and yet, as soon as he saw us, he said 'Shaphan and Nathan, sons of Reuben, welcome.' . . . We were with him several days and heard him teach the people as surely people were never before taught. We said, as did his other hearers, Never man spake like this man. And then the things that he did! Oh, it was good and yet awful to be there! How mightily and easily he did things which God alone can do! We saw lepers white as snow turned into sound men at his simple word; also one man who had lost a hand had it instantaneously restored in our presence. In passing through the country we met many who testified that they had been cured by him of the worst forms of disease in their last stages—cured in a moment, and without the use of any natural means whatever. Indeed, the land is full of such cases, so that not even the worst enemies of Jesus pretend to doubt his miraculous powers."

Tell me of the man whose hand was restored," said Cimon.

"A company of us were passing through a street when some blind men met us and cried to Jesus for help. We halted just before a butcher's stall where a man was dividing some meat with a cleaver. Another man and myself were pressed by the crowd close to the block where the work was being done. In his anxiety to see Jesus deal with the blind men, my neighbor laid his hand on the block suddenly, for the purpose of raising himself somewhat to get a better view, when the cleaver descended and struck off his entire hand. The blood spouted. A great outcry was made, and Jesus came up. He calmly said to the maimed man as he held up the bleeding stump, 'Be whole: and at once I saw a new hand occupying the place of the old. The whole crowd, as well as myself, carefully inspected the substitute and compared it with the original hand that still lay on the block.'"

"Missing limbs are not suddenly reproduced by human art," said Cimon.

"I am tempted to mention another matter more personal to myself," continued Shaphan. "I have already said that Jesus called us by our names. We found the next day that he knew more about us than our names. As my brother and myself were sitting by the wayside, Jesus came to us and said:

"You are troubled. When you reach home look again for the missing document and you will find it."

"And truly we were in trouble. When we were children our father was in partnership with a young man. But this young man gradually drew off into other business, and at length sold his interest in the khan to my father, who paid him for it in full and took from him a paper acknowledging the fact. In process of time this paper was lost. Of late this loss has somehow come to the knowledge of the man, and he now claims that he has never received payment and demands both the principal and the interest on it for more than thirty years. To pay this sum would ruin us. We had been again and again to our oppressor to ask for mercy. But in vain. So we were in deep waters when Jesus put out his hand and drew us out. For since my return I have found the missing paper."

"Who is this oppressor?"

"Malus."

"Has he already begun a suit against you?"

"No; but he threatens to do so within a short time, unless payment is made."

"Can it be that he is honest, and has merely forgotten?"

"He does not say that he does not remember having received the money. He absolutely denies having received it—could make oath to that effect; has a perfect recollection of all the circumstances, and has only been prevented from pressing his claim during all these years by tenderness of heart."

"Have you yet told him of the discovery?"

"Not yet."

"Would you be willing to withhold the news from him for a while?"

"If you wish."

"I wish you would; and perhaps we may be of service in helping you bring this crafty and powerful rogue to justice. But it will be a hard matter. My fear is that the officials of the city are themselves in league with him in some of his practices, and so will be disposed to shelter him in all . . . But this speaking of Malus reminds me of a matter that I must now attend to."

Cimon rose. It was time to proceed to the custom house. So, promising Shaphan to see him again as soon as possible; also informing him more particularly where they now lodged, in case he should have occasion to seek them ("and," said he, "I hope that your brother will soon make occasion by bringing further particulars about Jesus"), he took leave cordially.

The lake frontage was, and had long been, all alive with business. The cry of all nations was in the air. In the lake itself vessels of all sorts were coming and going; on the wharves boxes, bales, sacks were being handled with the same dispatch and carelessness that men now show in handling the goods of other people. Also, the custom house itself (a long, low building extending almost from the Gate of the Moon to the canal which joined the lake to the northern harbors) was in full swirl and roar, and had been for hours. But the chief official, like people of his sort in more modern times, did not make as early hours as his subordinates; had loitered over the morning meal and news, though not newspaper; and so had only just made himself comfortable in his office when Cimon presented himself—the first visitor.

The Roman looked up from his tablets on which he had been writing; and, seeing before him a very well dressed and dignified person, laid down his stylus and took an attitude of attention.

Cimon stated that he had waited on the chief of the customs in behalf of an eminent trader, to make certain inquiries which could not be so satisfactorily put to lower officials. Would it suit his convenience to hear them?

"What are they?" said the chief politely.

"If my principal were to send here a lot of eastern goods (silks, shawls, rugs, jewels), what duties would he have to pay?"

The Roman took down from a shelf a framed schedule and read from it certain figures. He looked up. The Greek was making a memorandum.

When he had finished, Cimon asked, "Can these rates be relied on for some time to come?"

"Doubtless; they have not been changed since the times of the Ptolemies."

Cimon made another entry on his tablets.

"Can you give me some idea what the course of trade has been in these eastern goods—what its annual amount, whether subject to fluctuations, whether on the whole increasing or decreasing?"

"I cannot," said the official. "To do this would require much time and labor in examining the registers."

"Then you register all lots of goods that come to you, and preserve the registers?"

"Certainly. We preserve them till they become too many for preservation."

"May I ask how long that is?"

"About fifteen years. At all events, we have the registry books for the last fifteen years."

Cimon made another entry, and then asked whether one willing to expend the time and labor would be allowed to examine the books, and if so on what terms.

After some hesitation the official replied that the theory was that the books should be open to the inspection of suitable persons, but that there were practical difficulties in the way.

"For example," said he, "the books of this year are in constant use for record and consultation by the officers of the custom house; the books of previous years are often needed by them for reference; and then, of course, an examination of the books by outside parties would have to be made in the presence of an official, and all the officials we now have are fully occupied with other duties from which they cannot well be spared; and one specially appointed would be expensive, if permissible."

Cimon said that he was ready to charge himself with all expenses.

The Roman hastened to say that even in that case an express permit from the prefect of the city, possibly from the Governor, might be necessary. He would make inquiry, and, perhaps, would be able to inform him within a day or two.

The Greek bowed. Meanwhile would the chief look over the memoranda he had made and see whether they were correct? He passed over the tablets.

The Roman looked them over carefully and pronounced them all right.

"Would the chief oblige him by writing as much on the tablets over his own signature?"

Yes—the chief would do that; and did it.

Cimon bowed again and withdrew.

On his way out he saw Malus entering. The two men seemed to recognize each other at the same moment. Instantly there flashed into the look of each something that told the other that the encounter was not pleasant. On the part of the Greek the flash was one that gave new erectness to his form and new gravity to his features; on the part of the Jew it was a flash of suspicion and alarm that for an instant expanded his eyes and perceptibly checked his movement. For an instant only. Then came a new woodenness into his face, and he seemed to retreat still further behind those small, half-closed eyes which yet lost nothing of their watchful expression. So on they came toward each other—the Greek unconsciously increasing the dignity and firmness of his tread, and keeping his eyes fixed on the approaching face as if bent on improving to the utmost an unwelcome opportunity for reading on that hard page whatever might be read. So they met and passed. Cimon never looked behind him. Had he done so he would have seen Malus standing at the door of the office just left and looking after him.

But the Greek did not need to see this. That steady look into the face of Malus, though brief, was enough to assure him that the suspicions of the man were all ablaze, and that he would not rest till he had found out whatever the custom-house chief could tell him. And probably he would be successful in suppressing any further light from that quarter. Cimon was thankful, however, that he had secured as much as he had. He trusted that it would be sufficient—perhaps it could be used to compel more.

He was now more than ever impressed with the necessity of hastening whatever further inquiries he had to make. It was still high day—why not proceed at once to the dealers in eastern goods whose addresses he had jotted down at the khan, and try to find out what had been the selling prices of eastern goods for as many years as possible? Why not even improve the opportunity of Malus' absence from his warehouse to go there and see what would be said by the subordinates when not overlooked by the master? As soon as the idea suggested itself, he accepted it. He would go to 110, 111, 112 Emporium St., first of all.

Accordingly, as soon as he had passed through the Gate of the Moon, turning leftward into the Greek quarter to lessen the chances of recognition, he proceeded northward till he thought he might be opposite to the warehouse of Malus, and then struck eastward into Emporium Street again. His venture was successful. Before him, stood the establishment he was seeking. As soon as he presented himself at the door he was politely saluted by a young man and invited to enter. What could he do for my lord?

My lord wished to be conducted to the chief man in charge of the department of eastern goods.

"Certainly, it would be done with the greatest pleasure. Would my lord be pleased to follow?"

This following took Cimon through a large part of the establishment. He could well believe it to be the largest warehouse in Alexandria. It was really an immense bazaar. One could find there almost anything that was bought and sold in the Roman world—from the toys of infants up to the furnishings of a royal palace, and even of a royal person. Messengers were hurrying about, crowds were coming and going, salesmen were crying out and displaying their goods from hundreds of stalls. It was a tempest of assault on the pouches of visitors. And many were evidently being captured.

The department to which Cimon at last came was specially attractive. Here, in an air through which stole the sweetness of the Indian nard and other costly aromatics, were piled or suspended miracles of the loom and needle, on some of which had been expended the labors of a lifetime—vels like sea-foams, embroideries to which the glowing oriental fancy and patient fingers had transferred landscape and legend and history and the starry heavens; gold and silver brocade from beyond the Ganges; silks, tapestries, housings, rugs, shawls from Persia and Cashmere; the whole brightened and multiplied wonderfully by polished steel mirrors judiciously placed. At the centre of the department was the collection of, precious stones. In a compartment whose walls were formed by suspended tapestries richly hued and pictured, in a case whose beauty and strength seemed to certify to the great value of its contents, lay pearls from the Persian Gulf, emeralds from the Caucasus, diamonds from the Oxus, turquoises from Media, rubies from Bokhara, and many other gems—all skillfully arranged into a stony rainbow.

Reader, U. S. S. Bennington. Is a man in the army or navy responsible for having to work on the Sabbath? To refuse to obey orders is a crime.

Under the circumstances, he cannot be considered responsible.

Mrs. Charles F. Sherman, Allentown, R. I. Did Judas hang himself by the neck, as people are hanged now, or did he cast himself off some high place and was dashed to pieces?

He hanged himself; the rope broke, apparently, and he was dashed to pieces. See Matt. 27: 5; Acts 1: 18.

J. D. Richardson, Hawkeville, Ontario, Can. Is the Editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD (Rev. Dr. Talmage) a Presbyterian in full connection, or a minister of the Congregational Church?

A Presbyterian, in full connection with the Presbytery.

Louis W. Heagg, Evanston, Ill. Is a young man who owns a very fast horse justified in training the animal so that he may get the most money for it?

We see no reason why the owner of a horse may not train it to the most perfect speed and condition, so as to increase its value. Reasonable training does not imply cruelty to the animal.

A. M. S., DeMotte, Ind. When a married couple have no children does an adopted child inherit the property just as an "own child" would do? In the event of the husband's death do two-thirds of the property go to his relatives or to the adopted child?

This is a question concerning which you should consult an experienced lawyer.

Mrs. W. E. Bute, Stanhope, Ia. Where can I find a poem entitled: "The Seven Fishermen," which contains lines somewhat like the following:

"Cast in your net on the other side,"

"Twas Jesus speaking across the tide."

Perhaps some of our readers may be able to furnish the information asked.

Id Settler, Milwaukee, Wis. What will become of the reprobates after the judgment?

The Scriptures distinctly tell us that they will be cast into endless punishment. See Matt. 25: 41, for Christ's own words on the matter; also Matt. 25: 46; II. Thess. 1: 9 and other passages.

Rev. M. F. Thomas, Greenville, Miss. How was St. John cast on the isle of Patmos and how did he leave it?

History tells us that during the reign of Emperor Domitian, who persecuted the Christians, John, who was then at Ephesus, was forced to flee to Patmos, whence he returned during the reign of the more tolerant Emperor Nerva, who recalled many of the exiles from banishment. John lived at Ephesus till a great age—surviving all the other apostles. There are many traditions concerning the manner of his arrival at and departure from Patmos but no reliable historical facts.

Mrs. McClintock, Gardner, Kan. 1. In what part of Asia were the seven churches spoken of in Rev. 1: 11, mentioned by Rev. Dr. Talmage in a recent sermon? 2. Who were the Nicolaitans?

1. Sardis was the capital city of Lydia; Ephesus on the west coast of Ionia; Smyrna in Ionia, on the Aegean Gulf; Philadelphia, 25 miles south of Sardis; Thyatira on the confines of Mysia and Ionia; Pergamos the capital of an ancient kingdom in Great Mysia, and Laodicea on the confines of Phrygia, about 40 miles east of Ephesus. All were in Asia Minor. 2. See answer to A. D. Keys, Baltimore in No. 50 of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Reader Wheeling, W. Va., was the body of Christ after his resurrection, the same body which was crucified and laid in the Sepulchre, or if changed, in what did the change consist?

It was evidently the same body, as the sepulchre where the body had been was empty after the resurrection. But a change had passed upon it, like, but in greater degree, that which passed on it at the transfiguration. It had supernatural powers, entering the room when the doors were shut, appearing and vanishing suddenly. But it was not spirit, as Christ explicitly stated, "A spirit hath not flesh and bones as ye see me have" (Luke 24: 39.) The five wounds were there and Thomas was invited to assure himself of identity by the touch. A further evidence of materiality was given when Christ partook of broiled fish and honeycomb. It was not a spirit and it was not an ordinary body, but as Paul describes it, "a spiritual body." Probably it was such a body as glorified believers will have after the resurrection when they "will be like him for they shall see him as he is."

E. W. Simpson, Norton, Va. Is it customary to use the form of the Lord's prayer as it appears in Matthew 6: verses 9 to 13, or is "trespasses" substituted for "debts"?

The custom in the Protestant Episcopal, Methodist Episcopal, Congregational, and other churches, is to use the form in Matthew, but substituting the word trespasses for debts in verse 12. The authority for so doing is found in the 13th verse.

DONALD KENNEDY
Of Roxbury, Mass., Says:

Strange cases cured by my Medical Discovery come to me every day. Here is one of Paralysis—Blindness—and the Grip. Now how does my Medical Discovery cure all these? I don't know, unless it takes hold of the Hidden Poison that makes all Humor

VIRGINIA CITY, NEVADA, Sept. 20th, 1891.

Donald Kennedy—Dear Sir: I will state my case to you: About nine years ago I was paralyzed in my left side, and the best doctors gave me no relief for two years, and I was advised to try your Discovery, which did its duty, and in a few months I was restored to health. About four years ago I became blind in my left eye by a spotted cataract. Last March I was taken with La Grippe, and was confined to my bed for three months. At the end of that time, as in the start, then it struck me that your Discovery was the thing for me; so I got a bottle, and before it was half gone I was able to go to my work in the mines. Now in regard to my eyes, as I lost my left eye, and about six months ago my right eye became affected with black spots over the sight as did the left eye—perhaps some twenty of them—but since I have been using your Discovery they all left my right eye but one; and, thank God, the bright light of heaven is once more making its appearance in my left eye. I am wonderfully astonished at it, and thank God and your Medical Discovery.

Yours truly, HANK WHITE.

Rheumatism

Mr. Bogardus of the "Christian Intelligencer" Tells How He was Cured.

"For about a year I had suffered on and off with a very lame shoulder, from rheumatism, and for which I did a great deal of doctoring, without receiving the least benefit. Finally, my father said, 'Why don't you try Hood's Sarsaparilla?' They advertise that this medicine has effected many in severe attacks of rheumatism. The thought had not occurred to me. I bought a bottle of Hood's Sarsaparilla, and while it is not quite gone, I think my rheumatism is gone completely. At any rate, I have not had a twinge of pain in that lame shoulder for some time past, and we have had some pretty trying weather. Put me down as a faithful believer in Hood's Sarsaparilla." R. F. ## THE "FERRIS" FAMOUS HAMS.

WHEN THE WINTER SEASON HAS PROGRESSED THUS FAR, POULTRY AND FRESH MEATS LOSE A LITTLE OF THEIR SPECIAL ATTRACTION, AND THE ENTERPRISING HOUSEKEEPER IS LOOKING OUT FOR SOME PLEASING VARIETY.

FOR A WINTER DINNER, SAY ONCE A WEEK, A DELICIOUS "FERRIS" HAM ROASTED WILL PROVIDE A MOST TEMPTING "PIECE DE RESISTANCE."

INSIST THAT YOUR GROCER SHALL FURNISH YOU A PLUMP, ROUND JOINT, FRESH FROM OUR CAPACIOUS SMOKEHOUSES, WEIGHING 13 POUNDS OR MORE. HAVE IT A LITTLE FAT ALSO, YOU WOULD FIND IT TENDER AND JUICY. WITH OUR COMPLIMENTS

To the Cook.

LET US SUGGEST HOW IT SHOULD BE HANDLED.

WITH A VERY SHARP KNIFE SHAVE OFF CLEANLY THE HARDENED SURFACE FROM THE FACE AND BUTT OF THE HAM. PUT IT OVER THE FIRE IN COLD WATER AND LET IT COME TO A MODERATE BOIL AND KEEP IT STEADILY AT THIS POINT. A HAM WEIGHING 13 POUNDS WILL NEED TO BOIL 5 HOURS. MANY COOKS SERVE HAM UNDER-DONE.

REMOVE THE SKIN, WHICH WILL RE-DILY PEEL OFF WHEN BOILED AS DIRECTED. HAVE READY SOME DRIED BREAD OR CRACKERS OF WHICH ROLL FINE AND SIFT A TEACUP FULL. BREAK IN TWO EGGS AND STIR WELL WITH ONE TEASPOONFUL OF SUGAR. USE A LITTLE WATER IF THE EGGS DO NOT SUFFICIENTLY MOISTEN IT. SPREAD THIS EVENLY OVER THE FAT AND DRESS WITH PEPPER AND SPICES. PUT THE HAM IN A PAN WITH A WIRE BOTTOM, OR, IF THAT BE NOT AT HAND, BLOCK UP THE HAM SO THAT THE FLESH SHALL NOT REST ON THE PAN. HAVE THE OVEN HOT AND SEND THE HAM TO THE TABLE AS SOON AS IT IS BROWNED. IN CARVING, CUT IN VERY THIN SLICES.

DIFFERENT MINDS.*

SOME murmur when their sky is clear,
And wholly bright to view,
If one sm.!! speck of dark appear
In their great heaven of blue.
And some with thankful love are filled,
If but one streak of light,
One ray of God's good mercy, gild
The darkness of the night.

In palaces are hearts that ask,
In discontent and pride,
Why life is such a dreary task,
And all good things denied.
And hearts in poorest huts admire
How love has, in their aid—
(Love that not ever seems to tire)
Such rich provisions made.

PEARLS FROM THOMAS A-KEMPIS.†

CERTAIN woman," says a-Kempis, in a Sermon to Novices, "who loved those things which are God's, used to visit frequently the church, and to hear freely the preaching of the Word of God. Once, when coming out of church, she was asked what good she had retained out of the sermon. Answering briefly, she said: 'I know not how to tell you much; but I heard well and retain this, that I am unwilling to sin.' She answered well and prudently as she had carried with her the fruit of a good discourse, that she would sin no more. Hence our Saviour says in the Gospels to the devout woman: 'Happy are they who hear the Word of God and keep it.'"

"Study at first" he writes in his Garden of Roses, "to learn humbly and to perform little things, and God will give thee greater things to understand more quickly if it would be useful to thee. He who knows and reads many things, if he does not do what he has known and learnt, departs empty and hungry from a full table."

"Our own curiosity," he declares in the Doctrinale Juvenum, "often hinders us in the reading of the Scriptures when we wish to understand and discuss, where we should simply pass on. If you wish to drink profitably, read humbly, imply and faithfully, nor ever wish for the name of learning. Ask freely and hear quickly the words of the saints; let not the parables of the elders displease thee, for they were not produced without cause."

"Whatever things are written in the Old and New Covenant" says Thomas a-Kempis in the Valley of Lilies, "are written to teach our souls that we may serve God faithfully by hating evil, and by cleaving to God, our highest happiness, with a pure heart, whole and perfect here and hereafter."

OLD BEN'S TWO ANGELS.‡

Widow Marsden curtsied as they passed, as did the rest of the neighbors and the Little Ladies smiled back their greetings with courtly grace. They knocked at the door and quite a genial voice called: "Come in." It was a proud moment for old Ben and when his guides caught sight of the blind man, they literally screamed with delight. He looked as if the whole village had raised a subscription to buy soap, and then had spent a whole day in cleaning him up. He had on a new suit of clothes and a new hat and wore an enormous red dahlia in his button-hole.

"You musn't ask me where I got de clo's, ladies," he said with a grin, "for I 'ave promised not to tell;" and the children for once were not curious and took it for granted that he had tidied himself up for their benefit.

"Well, you look lovely, Ben," said Nesta, as they walked round and round him, overcome by his appearance. "I really never should have thought you could have looked so respectable." And he grinned from ear to ear, thinking this was high praise.

"We'd better be starting now, I think," said Nesta, a little nervously. By a series of tugs and pushes they succeeded in steering the old man into the road, and then took up their position, one on each side of him, while the villagers looked on admiringly.

"They are just like two little hangels, in their white frocks and their golden 'eads of 'air," said the washerwoman. "No one ever saw the like; no never."

ON MORNING-GLORY FARM.*

"Gran'pa," said Dotty, poking her little fist into his big, brown palm and looking earnestly up into his face, her query glowing in her brown eyes, "what's the use of heaven, if you have to go into the ground?"

Her grandfather regarded her with a rather startled expression.

"Well, now, what on airth put thet into yer head, Daylight?" he asked.

Oh, everything," said Dotty, "seed and people and flowers and church and books. Please tell me, gran'pa?"

"Wal, Sunshine," said the old man, sitting down upon the chopping-block, taking off his hat and rubbing his hand over his hair, with a perplexed, helpless sort of manner. "Wal, Dotty, 'tain't exactly thet way. Ye see, 'tain't you thet goes inter the ground, it's about the same as w'en yer gran'ma lays by yer winter clo's in the cedar chest, come summer, w'en ye don't want 'em, Dotty, ye know. Now, how does thet strike yer?" and he restored his hat to his head with an air of relief, and returned her look with a half-quizzical, half-serious one.

"Oh," said Dotty, slowly, observing him attentively and wonderingly for a moment. Then a light broke over her countenance. "Oh, yes; I know," she went on joyfully, "it's just like the dandelions. They grow and they grow and they shine and they shine, until they're all white with shining, and then they blow away to some place where there are flowers all the time, all except the stem of them, and that is all withered up and isn't any good, and it falls down into the ground, I guess, and maybe it comes up some time all nice and fresh. And that is the way with us. It's the wilted part that God hides away, so it can be made over new, isn't it, gran'pa? And the white part of us blows away to heaven?"

"Wal, wal, child, I dunno; I daresay yer right. Come in ter yer breakfast an' leave yer meditations fer sometime w'en it aint so airly in the mornin'."

The strongest reason why you should take Hood's Sarsaparilla if your blood is impure, is found in the fact that it has effected many remarkable cures of blood disorders.

VAN MOUTON'S COCOA—"Best and goes Farthest."

Did you ever wash cut glass? It is full of narrow grooves and deep furrows. They are clear, brilliant and rainbow-hued. Use ordinary soap and at once the glass becomes dull and cloudy. The resin in the soap leaves a thin, semi-transparent tarnish on the surface.

Now wash with Ivory Soap (which contains no resin) using a soft brush and tepid water. You will be amazed at the result. The brilliancy of the glass seems intensified. The prismatic colors are now almost dazzling. Ivory Soap makes all this difference.

It is pleasant and palatable to take as honey. Does not produce Nausea, and is easily assimilated.

Its strengthening effects are almost immediate.

It does not come up to assert itself semi-occasionally after being swallowed, as other Emulsions certainly do.

It is a Great Producer of BONE and MUSCLE, it purifies the Blood, and patients gain rapidly in weight while taking it.

It is a true Emulsion, the only one that is always ready, always alike, and that never has a thick, gummy, and greasy blob at the top to upset the patient's stomach.

It is used in all the leading hospitals.

It is prescribed by the most eminent physicians in the United States and Canada, and many assert that it is

We are a patient people—the ox is nowhere in comparison.

We buy lamp-chimneys by the dozen; they go on snapping and popping and flying in pieces, and we go on buying the very same chimneys year after year.

Our dealer is willing to sell us a chimney a week for every lamp we burn—a hundred or more a year—and we plow for him, pay him for goading us.

Macbeth's "pearl top" and "pearl glass" do not break from heat; they are made of tough glass.

As likely as not our dealer would rather his chimneys would break; "it's good for the business," says he. He buys the brittlest ones he can get.

WHAT EDUCATES.

You ask, what will educate your son. Your daily example will educate him, your conversation with your friends; the business he sees you transact; the likings and dislikings he sees you express—the society you live in will educate him, above all, your rank, your situation in life, your table will educate him. It is not in your power to withdraw him from the continual influence of these things, except you were to withdraw yourself from them also. Education goes on at every instant of time; you can never stop or turn its course. What these have a tendency to make your child, that will he be.

THE MESSAGE.

THIS the Saviour's message to thee—
"Come to me, I'll give thee rest;
I am all-sufficient for thee,
Thou shalt be forever blest."

If you will accept this message,
And it comfort bring to you;
Won't you tell it then to others?
Jesus died to save them, too.

ENTERED IN.

At length the door is opened, and, free from pain and sin,
With joy and gladness on his head,
The pilgrim enters in;
The Master bids him welcome, and
On the Father's breast,
By loving arms enfolded, the weary is at rest.

The pilgrim's staff is left behind, behind the sword and shield,
The armor dimmed and dented on many a hard-fought field;
His, now the shining palace, the garden of delight,
The palm, the robe, the diadem, the glory ever bright.

And now from out the glory, the living cloud of light,
The old familiar faces come beaming on his sight;
The early lost, the ever loved, the friends of long ago,
Companions of his conflicts and pilgrimage below.

O, who can tell the rapture of those to whom 'tis given,
Thus to renew the bonds on earth amid the bliss of heaven?
Twice blessed be his Holy name, who for our fallen race
Hath purchased by his bitter pains such plenitude of grace.

Well Preserved!

To be so when well matured—that's the desideratum. To carry the physical strength of our prime into the intellectual strength of our later and wiser years.

Much of the world's best work has been done by aged workers. The warning message—"set thine house in order; for thou shalt die," has been as unwelcome to thousands of busy men and women as it was to King Hezekiah in the days of old.

Drs. Starkey & Palen's COMPOUND OXYGEN has for many busy workers moved "the dead line of 50," ten or twenty years further on—held off old age and invalidity until the wisdom and experience of a lifetime could add the capstone to a lifetime's work. No drug will do this. The fountain of youth, if found at all, is everywhere about us. The air we breathe—kind nature's kindly breath—when enriched with more oxygen, and magnetized, ministers marvelously to the peculiar needs of waning physical powers—arrests the progress of decay—gives strength and comfort to the period of old age.

We have proved this a thousand times over during the past twenty-two years. Shall we prove it to you?

A book of 200 pages gives names and addresses by the score, with fullest details. Do you need health and strength? The book is yours for the asking.

Itching Skin Humors

Torturing, Disfiguring Eczemas

And every species of itching, burning, bleeding, scaly, crusted, pimply, and blotchy skin and scalp diseases are relieved in the majority of cases by a single application, and speedily, permanently and economically cured by the CUTICURA REMEDIES when the best physicians, hospitals, and all other remedies fail. No language can exaggerate the suffering of those afflicted with these diseases, especially of little babies, whose tender skins are literally on fire.

CUTICURA

Remedies are the greatest skin cures, blood purifiers, and humor remedies of modern times, are absolutely pure, and agreeable to the most sensitive, and may be used on the youngest infant and most delicate invalid with gratifying and unfailing success.

CUTICURA, the great skin cure, instantly allays the most intense itching, burning, and inflammation, permits rest and sleep, heals raw and irritated surfaces, cleanses the scalp of crusts and scales, and restores the hair. CUTICURA SOAP, the only medicated toilet soap, is indispensable in cleansing diseased surfaces. CUTICURA RESOLVENT, the new blood and skin purifier and greatest of humor remedies, cleanses the blood of all impurities, and thus removes the cause. Hence, the CUTICURA REMEDIES cure every humor of the skin, scalp, and blood, with loss of hair.

"How to Cure Diseases of the Skin and Blood," mailed free to any address, 64 pages, 300 Diseases, 50 Illustrations, 100 Testimonials. A book of priceless value to every sufferer. CUTICURA REMEDIES are sold throughout the world. Price, CUTICURA, 50c.; CUTICURA SOAP, 25c.; CUTICURA RESOLVENT, $1. Prepared by POTTER DRUG & CHEMICAL CO.'N, Boston, U. S. A.

Pimply Skin

red, rough hands, painful finger ends and shapeless nails are prevented and cured by Cuticura Soap, incomparably the greatest of skin purifiers and beautifiers, while rivaling in delicacy and surpassing in purity the most expensive of toilet and nursery soaps. The only medicated toilet soap and the only preventive and cure of inflammation and clogging of the pores, the cause of pimples, blackheads, rough, red, and oily skin, and simple humors of infants.
